Three suspects in the killing of Palestinian farmer Abdul Majid Abu Turki appear in Jerusalem Magistrate's Court yesterday where two, who are minors, were remanded and the third was released on bail. (Brian Hendler)

Youths confess to 'prank' killing near Hebron

By MARGOT DUKAKITCH and MOHAMMED NAJIB

Two 16 year olds from a village for wayward youth in the West Bank settlement of Beit Hagai were remanded yesterday for six days by Jerusalem Magistrate's Court in the death of Abdul Turki, 48, from Hebron.

The two confessed to police that they had hit Abu Turki on the head with a wooden club from the window of a van as he was walking along a road near the settlement late Tuesday. They said they had not intended to kill him, but meant it as a prank. Abu Turki collapsed on the road and was rushed to a hospital in Hebron, where he died of his wounds. A farmer and laborer, he had 12 children.

The court imposed a gag order on the identity of the youths. According to reports, one of the minors has a criminal background and the other is reportedly disturbed.

The head of the Hebron Regional Council, Ephraim Hibsh, who is also director of the youth village, said the two youths were not from Beit Hagai, but lived with adopted families there and attended its school. Hibsh said seven youths were in the van returning to the village when one of them held a club outside the window and hit Abu Turki as they passed him.

The youths apparently spoke of the incident, but treated it as a "prank," not realizing the consequences of their act.

Hibsh said that when reports of Abu Turki's death were mentioned on radio and television, officials realized what had happened. After questioning those in the van, Hibsh and others escorted them to the police Tuesday night. The police released five youths and the driver, he said.

PM consulting on pullback referendum

By JAY BUSHINSKY and MICHAEL YUDELMAN

Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu is consulting with American public relations adviser Arthur Finkelstein on the possibility of putting the West Bank redeployment issue to a national referendum, a diplomatic source said yesterday.

This disclosure coincided with a senior political source's contention that Netanyahu tends to favor this idea, even if it causes a further delay in the second IDF withdrawal - an issue over which Israel and the Palestinian Authority are deadlocked and which US intermediaries have been unable to resolve.

A government aide close to Netanyahu denied that the prime minister has been in touch with Finkelstein over the referendum issue.

"Rumors to that effect stem from the presence in Israel of Alan Ross, who works for US businessman Ron Lauder, and who has not been involved in any aspect of domestic politics," the aide said. Channel 2 reported last night that Ross was Finkelstein's top aide.

Despite his former dismissal of the idea, Netanyahu has instructed cabinet secretary Dan Navon and Interior Minister Eliahu Suissa to look into the procedural and operative aspects of holding a referendum.

"It's possible to conduct a referendum in various ways," the source said, mentioning mail, telephone, or by utilizing the system used for national elections. "This would not require months, but only a few weeks," he said.

Before a referendum could be held, however, a law enabling it to take place would have to be passed by the Knesset.

Asked whether a referendum might not delay the conclusion of an Israeli-Palestinian agreement on the next IDF pullback, the source replied: "That is the price of democracy."

At a meeting of the Likud ministers yesterday, Netanyahu said the pullback is not a matter of the next few days and that he is seriously considering the option of holding a referendum on the issue.

"Anyone who thinks an agreement will be reached within a matter of days is wrong," he said, adding there has been progress toward implementation of the IDF's third West Bank pullback, but none whatsoever on the second one.

"We are standing firm on our demand for suspected terrorists and murderers to be transferred from the PA-administered areas to Israel to undergo interrogation and stand trial," the source said. "Revision of the Palestinian Covenant also is essential."

The source termed these and other actions specified in the Oslo Accords as a "reciprocity factor," which is built into the agreement. Replying to a question about the desirability of a summit meeting with PA Chairman Yasser Arafat, the source said: "A session with Arafat would be feasible only if the gaps dividing Israel and the PA can be closed."

"Right now the gaps are narrower than they were before, but we still are too far away from an agreement" to justify a rendezvous with Arafat.

The source criticized the US for making its initiative public, contending that "this tempted the Palestinians to do nothing and simply rely on the US to close the deal."

Manbar convicted of selling poison gas to Iran

News agencies

Businessman Nahum Manbar was convicted yesterday by Tel Aviv District Court of aiding an enemy state with intent to harm Israel's security by selling poison gas material and chemical weapons equipment to Iran.

Manbar faces a life term when he is sentenced on July 15.

Prosecutors had charged that Manbar, a former kibbutz member and paratrooper, had from 1990 to 1995 supplied Iran with material to produce mustard and nerve gas and equipment to build munitions factories for chemical warheads, earning $16 million.

Manbar, who also lived for a period in France, was secretly arrested in May 1997 while on a visit here. His trial was held

Lobbyists to campaign against young driver bill

By DAVID RUDGE and Jerusalem Post Staff

Memna, the public organization for the prevention of carnage on the roads, intends to launch a nationwide protest against final passage of a bill to allow young sters to begin taking driving lessons at the age of 16 and a half.

"I don't think there will be one mother in the country who will be in favor of this proposal," said Memna spokeswoman Zeldia Harris.

Arabs to revive plan for PLO upgrade at UN

Frustrated over the US failure to revive the Middle East peace process, Arab states have asked the UN General Assembly to reconsider a resolution upgrading the status of the PLO observer mission, diplomats said yesterday. Nasser Kidwa, the PLO observer at the UN, said Arab ambassadors asked the General Assembly to schedule a debate on the proposal next week, possibly Wednesday.

Other diplomats confirmed that the request had been forwarded to the president of the General Assembly, Hennadiy Udoenko, and that a decision was expected soon. AP

Double-murderer Aharoni paroled

Rahamim ("Gumadi") Aharoni, who has served two-thirds of a life sentence for a double-murder charge, was released yesterday from Ma'asiyahu Prison for good behavior. Aharoni said his happiness is tempered, because his accomplice, Tuvia Oshri, is still serving a life sentence. Aharoni still maintains that his crimes were committed in self-defense.

He also said that he is looking forward to beginning a new life, and may return to the meat-packing business. He added that he has been compiling material during his years of imprisonment and may write a book. Tim

PLO protests over settler Civil Guard

The PLO's UN observer, Nasser Kidwa, complained yesterday to UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan and the Security Council that the safety of Palestinians in the West Bank could be jeopardized by Israel allowing Civil Guard units to operate in Jewish settlements. He called it a "blatant violation of international law, the Fourth Geneva Convention, and relevant Security Council resolutions."

Kidwa also complained that "the illegal settlement of Ariel" had been granted city status, "implicitly indicating that it is not a part of the occupied territory anymore." An Israeli spokesman said Kidwa's statement was the PLO's own interpretation. Reuters

Labor campaigns to abolish direct elections

Labor MKs are renewing the initiative to abolish the law for direct elections of the prime minister. MK Rafael Edri called a meeting of some 20 party MKs at his Herzliya home next week, including Shimon Peres, Yossi Beilin and Uzi Baran, who are spearheading the move to abolish the law. Labor Party leader Ehud Barak, who opposes the move, was not invited. Michael Yudelman

Suspected war criminal Sakic expected in Croatia

Dinko Sakic, the alleged ex-commandant of the Jasenovac death camp in wartime Croatia, is expected to arrive in the Croatian capital under guard today pending a trial for crimes against humanity, according to Efraim Zuroff, director of the Simon Wiesenthal Center's office here.

Attributing his information to "Argentine and Croatian journalists," Zuroff said Sakic was flown yesterday from Buenos Aires to Frankfurt where he was to be transferred to a flight to Zagreb. "This is a tremendous step forward and a credit to Argentina's new determination to rid itself of Nazi war criminals," Zuroff said. Sakic, 76, had lived in Argentina for 50 years. Jay Bushinsky

Vilna'i declares himself civilian, to boycott farewells

By THOMAS O'DWYER

Maj.-Gen. Matan Vilna'i yesterday startled participants at a Tel Aviv seminar on the attitudes of Israeli youth by appearing in civilian clothes.

"I am in civilian dress because they decided I am a civilian," said deputy chief of staff Vilna'i, who earlier confirmed he was boycotting all traditional farewell events marking his retirement after 36 years IDF service.

"If they decided I am a civilian, then I know the rules," added Vilna'i, who has been embroiled in a public row with his former army rival, Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, who passed him over for the position of chief of staff.

Vilna'i earlier told reporters at the seminar that although his retirement is slated for August, he does not intend to wear a uniform again.

"I have drawn the line under my military career," he said. In his talk, on the attitudes of the modern young soldier and the future of defense, Vilna'i refrained from further public references to his personal career, but fired thinly veiled barbs at the national leadership.

"Some basics are clear to everyone in the country," he said. "In this jubilee year we are still in peril. And we have a peace process. There are not many states in such a position."

Maj.-Gen. Matan Vilna'i (IDF Spokesman)

Vilna'i said soldiers need more legitimacy for their orders today than in the past.

"Society asks questions, they ask questions," he said. "What is missing is leadership. Leadership is missing today, and these young people have to know what they are fighting for."

"There are no problems recruiting for combat units, but nothing must be taken for granted.... We are in an unprecedented situation, we should not assume things will progress in orderly fashion."

Quoting a 1947 comment by David Ben-Gurion, Vilna'i said, without additional comment: "We believe we have the best defense force prepared for almost anything, but it is obsolete, it is not for tomorrow."

Netanyahu appoints committee to look into legalizing Arutz 7

Police: Raid proves station is operating inside Israel

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH and LIAT COLLINS

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has appointed a ministerial committee to look into legalizing the pirate radio station Arutz 7 after its offices were raided yesterday morning by police.

"Arutz 7's legal status was not resolved for 10 years. I hope we will be able to resolve it," Netanyahu told parliamentary reporters.

He noted however that yesterday's closure of the station was in keeping with a High Court decision.

NRP whip Shmuryahu Ben-Tsur threatened to pull out from the coalition following the raid.

Netanyahu denied that NRP leader and Education Minister Yitzhak Levy had made a similar threat, although Channel One quoted Levy as saying he had considered stepping down after hearing about the raid.

Netanyahu said that Levy is a member of a ministerial panel which he has appointed on the issue.

The police raided offices and a recording studio belonging to the Arutz 7 early yesterday in Beit El, Psagot, Har Bracha and Tel Aviv. They confiscated equipment and gathered evidence they claim proves that the station broadcasts from inside Israel and not outside its territorial waters as it claims.

Residents of Judea, Samaria and Gaza were outraged by the move.

Settlement leaders called on Netanyahu to remember his promises to allow the station to operate legally.

A statement issued by the station charged that it was regrettable that such acts are carried out under a Likud government headed by Netanyahu whom the community fought so hard to get elected.

The Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza also denounced the raid as an attempt to shut the mouths of those opposing further withdrawals from the West Bank.

After meeting with Netanyahu, Levy said on Channel One that attempts were being made to allow the station to operate legally.

Transport Minister Shaul Yahalom (NRP) said that "on all important matters if we don't receive a positive answer then the thought of leaving the government passes through our minds."

Yahalom said he planned to ensure "the continued existence of Arutz 7."

Station manager Yaakov Katz said on Israel Radio yesterday "no one promised us a rose garden when we set up the station 10 years ago." Katz, who is in New York, argued that the station was legal.

Police Lieut. Cmdr. Moshe Mizrahi said that plans for a probe of the station last August had been delayed for fear it would result in violence.

Mizrahi said police had no plans to board the Eretz Hazvi ship from where the station is broadcast, but could monitor whether it was operating within the country's territorial waters.

A police statement yesterday said that Beit El police found a transmitter and a recording and broadcasting studio and two transmitters in Psagot that were dismantled and hidden in a warehouse as police arrived on the scene.

The statement said there were plans to question the station's managers after Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein reviews an expected court ruling on the matter.

MK Rehavam Ze'evi (Moledet) denounced the raid as the prime minister's "revenge against the settlers for deciding to fight against the redeployment. Netanyahu was elected with the aid of the settlers. Now he's trying to gag them but their voice will continue to be heard."

MK Eitan Cabel (Labor), who petitioned the High Court to order the station's closure, accused Arutz 7 of operating illegally and of broadcasting "words of hate."

He alleged that the station also took away advertising from legal stations operating under a franchise.

Cabel also accused NRP ministers of "trying to delegitimize the rule of law."

"The NRP has once again proven that it has become a party of extremists giving its support to lawbreakers," Cabel maintained.

Meretz leader Yossi Sarid welcomed the raid and said it was long overdue.

Sharon denies inviting Levy back

By MICHAEL YUDELMAN

National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon and former foreign minister David Levy had a lengthy late-a-meet in Tel Aviv on Monday in what was seen as part of the preparations for the second pullback.

Sources close to Levy said Sharon had asked Levy, in Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's name, to return to the position of foreign minister.

This triggered a flurry of speculations in the political system regarding a cabinet reshuffle to enable Netanyahu to pass a decision on the second pullback without losing his cabinet majority.

But sources from Sharon's office denied that Sharon had prodded such a message from Netanyahu, or passed it on. The sources would not say what Levy and Sharon had discussed.

Levy said recently that until a decision is made on the pullback he would not comment on any offers to return to the cabinet.

Sharon also met with Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai in Jerusalem yesterday for what was described as "a meeting on current affairs and daily matters." Sources from Sharon's office said the meeting had nothing to do with the differences of opinion between the two over the second pullback.

One source said "the disagreement is legitimate. It does not affect the cooperation of the two to advance national issues or the friendship between them."

Meanwhile, Netanyahu this week met with senior rabbis from Kiryat Arba who object to the pullout from the territories. This was part of the prime minister's efforts to persuade the leaders of the West Bank settlers to support the pullback.

In another development, Agudat Yisrael MKs threatened to leave the coalition unless Netanyahu fulfills his promises regarding the conversion bill by next week's meeting of its Council of Torah Sages.

HEBRON

In Hebron, shopkeepers closed their stores and declared a day of mourning. Yesterday, relatives of Abu Turki erected a stone memorial covered with olive branches at the site where he was attacked.

His cousin, Mahmoud Abu Turki, who was with him at the time of the incident, said a settler driving a van hit Abu Turki on the head and fled the area. Abu Turki's older son accused the settlers of killing his father in cold blood.

Late yesterday afternoon, Israel Radio reported that an inquest at the Abu Kabir Forensic Institute had determined that Abu Turki suffered from an illness that affected the artery leading to the brain. The force of the blow was not strong, the report said, but it tore the artery leading to the brain and caused internal bleeding. According to the report, had Abu Turki been healthy, it is possible he would not have died from the blow.

Abu Turki was buried last night in Hebron as security forces on both sides remained on alert.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu condemned the killing, calling it horrific and saying those responsible would be punished. Minister of Education Yitzhak Levy said, "No one has the right to murder on either side or take the law into their own hands."

The Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza condemned the act. Beit Hagai residents said Abu Turki was well known and had worked in the settlement.

"We send our condolences to the family. It is tragic that such a prank resulted in his death," they said. Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's aide, Ahmed Tibi, took issue with the word "prank." "Murder is murder. Abu Turki didn't die, he was murdered, and attempts to claim it was a prank are unacceptable."

Hebron Governor Aziz Amr warned that "calm and stability will not prevail as long as Jewish settlers remain on our land."

PA Hebron police commander Brig.-Gen. Tarik Zeid said he met with Israeli police at the local station yesterday morning and was informed of the arrest of the two youths. He praised the cooperation and the rapid action taken by the Israel Police.

Last night, Labor and Social Welfare Minister Eli Yishai ordered the establishment of a committee to investigate the operations of the youth village.

Liav Collins contributed to this report.

REFERENDUM

From Israel's standpoint, he went on, this was tantamount to negotiating with ourselves. "This creates a dangerous situation. If this is the way they want to operate, then let the Americans provide them with the material they seek," he said, implying that only Israel could decide what territory to cede.

President Ezer Weizman said he was not promising a safety net to Netanyahu for the withdrawal decision, but that if the prime minister agrees on a pullback with the Palestinians that the public supports, then the Knesset should back him. Speculation about discussions of forming a national unity government were boosted yesterday by a report that Netanyahu had asked opposition leader Ehud Barak at their meeting last Friday whether there is a majority in Labor who would support a joint government.

Barak reportedly did not answer directly, saying Labor has one goal, to replace the present government.

Netanyahu also reportedly asked Barak whether Labor would provide him with a parliamentary safety net to ensure a Knesset majority for the pullback. Barak reportedly answered that he is not convinced the second pullback is imminent, and therefore sees no point in discussing how his party would vote.

In another development, former prime minister Shimon Peres and his wife, Sonia, had dinner with Barak and his wife, Nava, at the Barak's home in Kochav Yair earlier this week.

Under the proposal, youngsters could begin taking driving lessons at 16 and a half and receive a license by 17. They would have to drive for six months under the supervision of an experienced driver. Those who receive license at 17 and a half would have to do the same for two months.

The Knesset Economics Committee yesterday endorsed the first reading of the bill.

"This proposal is all wrong according to statistics from Israel and throughout the world," said Harris, "which show that the high-risk group is between the ages of 17 and 25. Furthermore, this will add to the congestion on the roads and only make the task of those trying to cut down the numbers of people killed and crippled for life on the roads just that much harder."

Harris said the proposal only serves "interest groups" such as car dealers, garages, insurance companies, gas station owners and the government which would earn more from increased road taxes.

"All this at the expense of the lives of youngsters and people who will be badly injured. We were denied the opportunity of giving our views at the committee meeting, so now we will launch a campaign to prevent this proposal becoming law," said Harris.

Road Safety Authority Director-General Shmuel Hershkovitz said that, although the age for a driver's license has been reduced, potential danger has also been reduced by the requirement to drive with an experienced driver for six months. This will infuse the new driver with proper knowledge of the road, thus reducing the amount of accidents, he said.

Even after the bill is passed, he added, Israel would still be conservative regarding its minimum driving age compared to the US and Europe. Eleven US states allow 16-year-olds to have a license. In France and Sweden, a 16-year-old may drive with an adult.

Israeli charged in murder of London TV model

By DOUGLAS DAVIS and DAVID RUDGE

A 21-year-old Israeli, Yaniv Malka, sobbed uncontrollably yesterday after appearing in a London court, where he was charged with murdering a well-known television model and film actress in her apartment Saturday night.

Malka, who was handcuffed and dressed in a white, forensic-type boiler suit, held his head in his hands and spoke only twice during his 10-minute court appearance - to confirm his name and that he lived in Israel. He did not apply for bail.

Following the appearance, Malka could be heard sobbing hysterically and saying: "She's waiting for me now", as he was led away to his cell.

Malka was arrested after being coaxed down from the roof of a tower block near the model's apartment building in the trendy London district of Islington. It is believed that cuts to his wrists were self-inflicted. He is now being held until his next court appearance on Tuesday under an around-the-clock suicide watch.

Slee-eyed and sultry Kadamba Simmons, aged 24, who appears in television advertisements for Pantene shampoo, was strangled to death, her naked body found hanging in the shower of her apartment.

In Migdal Ha'emek, the family of Malka was still in a state of shock yesterday. Yaniv's father, schoolteacher Meir Malka, said he had only received one telephone call from him saying that he had been arrested.

"He's a boy who loves to be happy. I can't believe that he would be capable of anything like this," Malka told reporters.

The family is hoping to make arrangements to go to London.

"Our lives have been turned upside down and we won't be able to do anything until we find out what's happening," said Malka.

Simmons is the former girlfriend of a string of high-profile men, including the musician Liam Gallagher, from the group Oasis, former Bros singer Matt Goss, and British boxing champion Naseem Hamed.

After meeting Hamed in 1995, she converted to Islam so that they could be "spiritually closer". In an interview at the time, she said the boxer had "made me realize I can trust and respect a man again. For the first time in a long time, I feel safe, happy and loved".

The relationship did not last, however, and she subsequently made two trips to India in search of spiritual fulfillment.

It was on the last of those trips that she met Malka, who reportedly became infatuated with her and followed her back to London earlier this month. He had, apparently, been offered a job and accommodation by friends in London, but when they refused to pay him and threw him out of their apartment, he was forced to seek refuge in a hostel for the homeless.

In a recent interview, Simmons spoke of her ambition to be a film star by the age of 30 and of her fear of boredom. "If you want me," she said, "surprise me, shock me, disgust me, do something out of the blue, take me somewhere I have never been, tell me something I have never heard."

By ELLI WOHLGELERNTER

Amelia Cohen, the nine-year-old pupil who fell from a school's second-floor window on Tuesday, was still clinging to life late last night and was listed in critical condition at Hadassah University Hospital-Ein Kerem.

Doctors told Israel Radio yesterday that Cohen's chances of survival were very slim.

At the same time, a police inquiry and a five-man committee appointed by the Education Ministry continue to investigate to determine who was responsible for the accident at the Luria School in Jerusalem.

An issue central to the investigations is the lack of bars on the window from which Cohen fell.

Only a week ago, the principal of the school sent a letter to the Jerusalem Municipality, asking that the city replace the gates that had been removed last summer during renovations.

The city explained that the height of the window sill was adequate to meet standards, and that under the law, the protective gates were unnecessary. The city also said that the gates would only serve to give students a "bad feeling" of being closed in, and that it was better they were removed.

Yesterday, the city decided to reinstall the protective window gates.

Police, meanwhile, questioned several school employees "under a 16 percent cut in the security budget this year, from NIS43.9 million to NIS36.9 million. "The Education Ministry has to budget NIS150 million to refurbish and renovate old educational institutions, that have grave security problems," Abuav said. "He said in a statement that the average age of the schools in the country was 25 years, and that the problem of security in schools was a major concern of the government.

HEBREW PRESS REVIEW

By ORLY AHARONI

In control

"The harsh firmness with which [Prime Minister Binyamin] Netanyahu silenced Chief of General Staff Lt-Gen. Amnon Lipkin Shahak did not add any dignity to the chief of general staff nor any glory to the prime minister," writes Ma'ariv's Yosef Lapid, criticizing Netanyahu's conduct in last Sunday's cabinet session where Shahak was cut off by the prime minister during his report.

Lapid attributes Netanyahu's conduct to Shahak threatening his popularity.

Yedioth Aharonot's Alex Fishman adds that the outburst was also a result of a chilly relationship between the two men and that Netanyahu had snapped.

Ben-Dror Yemini takes a different view in Ma'ariv. "The fact that Netanyahu has made a huge mistake in the way he is leading us all, does not automatically mean that he is mistaken in this incident," he writes, adding that military leaders should not be discussing politics.

Yedioth's Ron Ben-Yishai says that "the government is the army's command and the chief of general staff is subordinate to it, according to the law, and not to the prime minister."

Matti Golan, also in Yedioth disagrees and feels that although it is not smart to refuse to listen to a conflicting stand, it is the prime minister's prerogative, especially if he believes that the information might hinder the negotiations with the Palestinians.

He adds that any prime minister would have reacted similarly under these circumstances.

General dissatisfaction

Commentators address the disappointment of both Likud and Labor members with their party leaders.

"There is almost an absolute symmetry between the contending parties on a crucial point: leadership," writes Ha'aretz's Ron Kislev. He maintains there is not one person in the Likud who does not believe that choosing Netanyahu was a grave mistake.

As for Labor Party chairman Ehud Barak, "he was chosen to head Labor not because of his political skills; like Netanyahu, the party members thought that he could bring him the highest number of votes."

Ya'acov Yona in Ma'ariv refers to Likud MKs Benny Begin, Dan Meridor and Tel Aviv Mayor Roni Milo who are Netanyahu's main adversaries. Yet, ironically, they were his biggest supporters during his campaign for premiership.

"Their criticism today against Netanyahu should be regarded within limits and with cynicism. Not that they are mistaken, but [the criticism] just came too late, especially from those who could have and were obligated to express it in the moment of truth, but preferred to crown Netanyahu."

Ran Adalst also in Ma'ariv believes that Netanyahu manages to preserve an aura of fame and respect because he surrounds himself with people that help him in public relations. Barak could do the same, he says.

"Barak is like a plane on the runway, ready to take off. He is the body but those surrounding him are the engines, meant to stir the air and allow him to fly."

Trance

Rafi Man criticizes Meretz MK Dedi Zucker in Ma'ariv for intervening on behalf of partygoers in Kfar Shmaryahu whose trance festivities were interrupted by police officers searching for drugs.

He argues that this is not the kind of issue "we would expect to find a Meretz member" defending.

MKs ask about nuclear testing in Gulf of Eilat

By LIAT COLLINS

Two MKs yesterday asked in the Knesset whether Israel had recently secretly carried out nuclear testing. The two – Rafi Elul (Labor) and Abdul Wahab Darawshe (Democratic Arab Party) – apparently both based their questions on the claims of an Egyptian nuclear scientist, Tariq Nimr, that Israel is carrying out nuclear tests in the Gulf of Eilat.

Darawshe said the latest test – of a neutron bomb – was carried out on May 28 and resulted in earthquakes in the area.

According to the Seismological Institute, there was an earthquake on May 28 – but it was west of Alexandria along the Egyptian coast and was the result of natural seismological activity and not from nuclear testing.

Although Deputy Defense Minister Silvan Shalom ignored the question when Elul raised it in the plenum, he later issued a statement noting that Israel is a signatory of the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty and abides by it. He also called on other countries to join the test ban.

"Elul's charges are baseless," Shalom said.

"Israel has never carried out nuclear testing," said Dr. Ephraim Asculai, spokesman for the Israeli Atomic Energy Commission. He also said Israel abides by the test ban. Asculai said that the IAEA had not received any request from the International Atomic Energy Agency on the matter, although both Elul and Darawshe claimed that the international agency is investigating it.

Darawshe is calling on Israel to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, a demand Egypt has repeatedly raised. Elul's questions dealt mainly with the safety of the Negev Nuclear Research Center in Dimona.

In his answer on the safety issue, Shalom said the reactor is regularly examined and has been determined to be safe. The safety is checked by the safety division of the NNRC, the licensing branch of the Atomic Energy Commission, and the independent committee for nuclear safety.

He said half the nuclear research reactors in the world are the same age or older than Israel's.

Agency plans to end immigrant tuition grant

By LIAT COLLINS

More than 10,000 immigrant students could find themselves without a tuition grant if the Jewish Agency follows through on its plan to halt support of the Students Authority.

The Immigration and Absorption Ministry and the Jewish Agency had each been supplying half the authority's $36 million budget. This year the Jewish Agency unexpectedly cut its support by $3.5m, and now it is expected to end its support altogether.

At an emergency meeting of the Ministerial Committee on Diaspora, Immigration and Absorption Affairs yesterday, Immigration and Absorption Minister Yuli Edelstein and Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky used the word "painful" to describe the decision.

The committee presented a resolution under which the Immigration and Absorption Ministry would take over running the Students Authority and receive state funds to cover the costs. However, a representative of the Finance Ministry, Natasha Michaelov, said such a change would not be possible at this stage of the 1999 budget discussions.

Edelstein said the affects of the decision are being felt already because the universities have announced they will not allow the immigrant students to register for the preparatory courses in August because they cannot be sure they will receive payment.

Michael Rosenberg, head of the Jewish Agency's Immigration and Absorption Department, said at the moment "the trend is to drastically reduce" the funds, although he could not state whether this means cutting them altogether or paying just a symbolic amount.

The Jewish Agency's plan to withdraw support of the Students Authority apparently follows a decision by its board of directors to cut funds in Israel in several areas.

According to Immigration and Absorption Ministry deputy director-general Hanoach Zamir, the decision would mainly affect immigrant students, who would not be able to complete their studies and graduate.

Many young immigrants from the CIS postponed their academic studies to do military service on the understanding their tuition fees would be covered later by the Students Authority.

"Now they now stand to lose this aid," said Ze'ev Galzel, an adviser to the prime minister on immigration.

The largest number of students affected comes from eastern Europe and the CIS (7,165); 830 come from western Europe; 464 come from North America; and 590 come from Latin America.

More than 1,000 Ethiopian immigrants also will suffer from the cuts. Nearly 60 percent of the immigrant students are pursuing degrees in the fields of science and technology.

"I don't need to tell you what this means in terms of future development," Zamir said.

Eighty percent of the authority's budget goes on tuition fees and the rest is spent on extra academic help, information and counseling, social and cultural activities, maintenance of dormitories, and stipends.

Knesset Speaker Dan Tichon (left) accepts a copy of the Amnesty International report from local chairman Mickey Ehrlich at his office yesterday.

Amnesty criticizes both Israel, PA

By DAN IZENBERG and AP

Eighteen Palestinians were shot dead by Israeli security forces in 1997, even though most of them appeared to pose no threat. In the autonomous areas, seven Palestinians died in detention and the torture of detainees appears to have been widespread.

These are some of the findings of the 1997 Amnesty International annual report on worldwide human rights violations. The report was released in London yesterday and a copy was delivered to Knesset Speaker Dan Tichon. With regard to Israel, Amnesty found that at least 1,900 administrative detention orders were served in 1997. Of these, 354 detainees remained in jail by the end of the year.

In one case, Marwan Ma'ali committed suicide in Megiddo Military Prison one month after being detained. Psychiatrists diagnosed Ma'ali as depressive with suicidal tendencies and recommended that he be released or hospitalized. Despite the circumstances, his administrative detention was extended by five months shortly before his suicide.

Amnesty found that Israeli security forces frequently beat Palestinians at checkpoints, during demonstrations, and immediately after arrest.

In July, border policemen stopped Mohammed Salah at a checkpoint, beat and kicked him, and left him in a ditch. The injuries he sustained included a broken nose and a wound requiring five stitches. No action appears to have been taken against the policemen, according to the report.

Amnesty found that the Palestinian Authority arrested 400 Palestinians in 1997 and that 115 political detainees from previous years were still in jail by the end of the year.

One of the seven Palestinians who died in PA custody was Yusef Bab, who died one month after his arrest by the Ishtikharat, one of the 11 different security services in the PA-controlled areas. His body showed severe burns, bruises, and rope marks.

Palestinian torture methods reported by Amnesty included beatings, sometimes while the prisoner was hanging by the wrists, and prolonged sleep deprivation.

In July, the PA appointed a new attorney-general, Fayed Abu Rahma, who promised to reexamine the files of 183 political detainees held since May 1994. The following month, he ordered the release of 11 detainees held for two years without charges or trial. As soon as they were released, they were arrested by the Preventive Security Service and were still in jail by the end of the year.

Government spokesman Moshe Fogel said Amnesty failed to take into account the constant security threat faced by Israel from the belligerent Palestinian population it administers.

"It is unfair not to put these circumstances in their proper context, and that is one of a battlefield," he said. "It's the height of hypocrisy. Human and civil rights have been and will continue to be respected in spite of the combat situation which has been imposed upon Israel."

Hanan Ashrawi, minister of higher education in Arafat's cabinet and former head of a Palestinian human rights commission, said the Palestinians take the Amnesty report very seriously. "We will look at them, investigate them, acknowledge them if they exist, and punish those who are responsible," she said.

Roman finds unearthed under Rambam Hospital

By DAVID RUDGE

Archeologists have uncovered remains of a settlement dating back to the late Roman and Byzantine period, literally under the floor of Haifa's Rambam Hospital.

A mosaic floor, that apparently formed part of a container for storing liquids or for a wine press, was discovered under the hospital's radiology department during renovations and expansion work.

That discovery only came about because of excavations at another part of the hospital complex where new operating theaters are to be built.

Dror Barchard, archaeologist for the Antiquities Authority's Haifa district, said that the building work had uncovered archeological remains.

He said the construction work was stopped, in accordance with the law, to enable exploratory excavations to take place at the site. It will be decided later whether the finds warrant a full scale rescue excavation before the actual construction work can resume.

So far, the digging at this site, which started three weeks ago, has unearthed pottery shards, coins, storage jars, glassware and walls of a building, all of which date back to the Byzantine and late Roman period. Some remains from the Hellenistic period, around the third century BCE were also found.

Until now, little has been known about ancient Haifa other than from written records which noted that there was a settlement there from the Hellenistic period, through Roman and Byzantine eras, the Arab and Crusader periods and the reign of the Ottoman Empire.

Police to check if Neeman needs guard after threats made on his life

Police investigations chief Cmdr. Yossi Sadbon has asked the head of the General Security Service, Ami Ayalon, to examine whether Finance Minister Yisrael Neeman should be given personal protection following threats against his life.

An anonymous letter sent to Neeman recently said a large part of the public considers him a traitor.

It cursed him with cancer and used words like dog, Nazi and murderer.

The threat also said that Neeman shames the Kippa he wears as a religious Jew.

Neeman's stand on the conversion bill and his attempts to get more haredim to join the workforce has angered some haredim.

Uproar over Bar-Ilan student elections

An uproar broke out in the Knesset plenum yesterday when MK Hagai Merom (Labor) condemned the election of Meir Lapid as head of the Bar-Ilan University Students Union.

Merom accused Lapid, who lost a father and a brother in an attack outside Kiryat Arba five years ago, of being a Kach supporter and writing a poem in praise of Baruch Goldstein.

He also blasted the university as an educational failure.

KNESSET BRIEFS

By LIAT COLLINS

MK Benny Elon (Moledet) said Merom's statements were untrue and based on the past involvement of Lapid's mother, Miriam Lapid, with a right-wing party.

Speaker Dan Tichon calmed the MKs down by promising that the matter would be discussed next week.

Prayers at the Western Wall

Responding to motions by hard-line MKs on non-orthodox worship at the Western Wall, Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani said that the matter is being discussed in the High Court and that attempts were being made to find a spot in the Western Wall plaza where non-Orthodox prayers could be held.

He said that the High Court had determined that the attorney-general should try to find a compromise.

MK Benny Elon (Moledet) noted that the High Court case related to the Women of the Wall and not non-Orthodox services although it could probably set a precedent for this issue as well.

Reading from the 80-page decision, Judge Amnon Straschnov, who headed a panel of three, said that Manbar "has been found guilty of giving information to the enemy, and aiding the enemy in its war against Israel."

Manbar denied wrongdoing and said he coordinated his sales to Iran with agents of the General Security Service.

"If I am guilty so are at least 200 people. Maybe I am guilty of naivete, but definitely not of trying to harm the country," Manbar told reporters.

"Another 100 or 200 people should have been convicted with me – directors of factories, industry. Why me?" he asked after the conviction, describing himself as a needle security authorities picked out of a haystack.

Manbar told the court that he "had heard of other Israeli companies doing business with Iran" and didn't think his supplies were being used for military purposes.

"During that period, no one thought there were any problems with that country," Manbar also said.

Straschnov said Manbar lied repeatedly to the court and tampered with evidence to cover up his business dealings with Iran.

"He played a double game, supplying the Iranians with components for weapons of mass destruction, while deliberately misleading the Shin Bet regarding his business deals," the judge said.

The judges rejected an argument made by Manbar's attorney, Amnon Zichroni, that Iran is not an enemy state since war has never been declared between Israel and that Islamic nation.

According to Itim, Manbar maintained he had signed a 1992 mustard gas deal only fictitiously as a means for his contact, Majed Abasbur, the head of Iran's chemical weapons program, to extract money from the Iranian budget.

Zichroni reportedly said that Iran wasn't considered an enemy at the time and that his client had been promised immunity from prosecution.

A-Sanaa's bid to alter flag, anthem evokes ire in Knesset

By LIAT COLLINS

The blue-and-white national flag acted as a red flag yesterday when the Knesset heard a proposal by MK Taleb A-Sanaa (Arab Democratic Party) to change it to one with which Moslems and Christians can identify.

A-Sanaa also asked that the national anthem be altered.

The motion was defeated by a vote of 53-7 at the end of a stormy debate. All those in favor were members of the Democratic Arab Party and Hadash.

Labor and Meretz MKs voted against.

A-Sanaa suggested a crescent and cross be added to the Star of David on the flag.

"Just as the president represents all the country's citizens, Arabs and Jews, so should the flag and anthem represent all citizens and not just some of them," A-Sanaa said.

"One can say these are not the flag and anthem of the state but the flag and anthem of the Zionist movement since before the state was established," he added.

"Where do you find the Arabs in Hatikva, the national anthem?" he asked.

Tourism Minister Moshe Katsav, who heads the ministerial committee on symbols and ceremonies, and is also responsible for Arab affairs, urged the Arab population to respect the country's symbols.

"This is a Jewish state and will remain one," he said. He also noted that there had always been a Jewish presence in the Land of Israel.

"Can you conceive of a religious Jew in Switzerland not respecting the flag because of the cross on it?" he asked.

Shevah Weiss (Labor) suggested A-Sanaa drop the motion. "The State of Israel is called Israel and by this logic it should be called by a different name," Weiss said.

Tender competition

A bill proposing that government companies which fail to allow Israeli companies to compete in tenders be punished by being barred from participating in local tenders themselves, was passed yesterday on a preliminary reading.

The bill was filed by MK Yona Yahav (Labor).

Australian support

The Speaker of the Australian Parliament, Ian Sinclair, led a parliamentary delegation to the Knesset yesterday where he was met by a full guard of honor.

Knesset Speaker Dan Tichon, in a speech to the guests in the plenum, said, "Australia was one of the supporters of the partition plan in 1947 and has stood by Israel throughout the intervening years in friendship and understanding."

Tichon said there is room to expand and improve trade and economic relations.

"Much has been done, but it is not enough. The geographical distance is no longer an obstacle. Israel can offer Australia assistance in areas important to your country such as agriculture, land conservation, water, high tech industry, multimedia and so on."

And it is near certain an appeal will be submitted," Zichroni said.

According to the charge sheet, Manbar met several times in Europe with his contact, Abasbur, identified in the indictment as head of the "Iranian chemical warfare project," and signed a contract with him.

The indictment said that 150 tons of materials for weapons production were delivered by 24 trucks to Iran from an undisclosed location in Europe.

The judges found that Manbar did not heed a warning from Israeli security officials in 1993 to cut all business dealings with Iran.

In July 1994, the US State Department said Manbar and two of his companies violated a US trade embargo against Iran, and Manbar was barred from the US.

Israeli newspapers reported last year that US officials asked Israel to stop Manbar's activities and the CIA provided new information to Israel on Manbar's links with Iran.

Parts of the indictment and yesterday's judgment were not released publicly for reasons of state security.

Nimrodi confesses in plea bargain

Ma'ariv chairman Ofer Nimrodi confessed yesterday as part of a plea bargain to wiretapping senior editors of Yediot Aharonot four years ago.

Under the plea bargain presented to the Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court yesterday, six of the 16 charges against Nimrodi will be dropped.

The prosecution has asked that Nimrodi be sentenced to eight months' imprisonment plus a 10-month suspended sentence that would be imposed for any violations committed in the coming three years. The prosecution also asked that he be fined NIS 1,100,000, the maximum fine for his crimes.

Nimrodi has asked for a suspended sentence.

Charges for obstructing the investigation will be dropped, as will those for ordering wiretaps on several people, including Eli Ze'ira, who has sued Ma'ariv for libel, and Giora Gilat, who now heads Yediot's computer department and formerly held that position at Ma'ariv.

Nimrodi still will be convicted of violating the law regulating wiretaps, ordering wiretaps illegally, illegal use of wiretapping equipment, and disrupting court proceedings.

Nimrodi has confessed to ordering taps on the phone lines of Yediot editors Amnon Mozes, Moshe Vardi, Ruth Ben-Ari, Miriam Mozes and Yanouli Angel and Yediot's business manager Haim Rozenberg. He also had a tap put on the fax machines at Geocartography, which was doing marketing research for Yediot, and a company that was sharing an office with the accounting firm Yediot used.

Nimrodi had Ma'ariv's security officer, David Ronen, hire two private investigators to tap the telephones, cellular phones and fax machines. Ronen has confessed to this, as part of a plea bargain.

After the two private investigators, Rafi Friedan and Ya'acov Tsur, were arrested, Nimrodi paid them almost $250,000 in hush money.

The court also will be presented with the plea bargain Ronen has agreed to, under which he would be sentenced to six months' community service, a six-month suspended sentence, and NIS 100,000 fine.

(Tim)

Michael Yudelman adds:

Nimrodi was not in his office during the day yesterday and could not be reached for comment on the plea bargain. The newspaper did not issue an official response.

Senior Ma'ariv staff members said there was nothing to add to their initial reaction of surprise earlier this month, when they learned Nimrodi had decided to plead guilty.

Channel 1 news commentator Amnon Abramovitz, who resigned from Ma'ariv over the telephone wiretapping, said yesterday, "I have only one thing to say. I'm the last person who should be commenting today."

Ofer Nimrodi appears in Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court yesterday.

Insulin 'sniffing' offers breakthrough in treatment of diabetes - experts

By JUDY SIEGEL and The Los Angeles Times

Insulin-dependent diabetics here and abroad will enjoy a "revolution" in treatment in two years, when insulin in powdered form becomes available for "sniffing" via the mouth into the lungs instead of most injections.

Prof. Itamar Raz, head of the Israel Diabetes Association and a diabetes expert at Hadassah-University Hospital Eln Kerem, yesterday confirmed foreign reports of the technique's efficacy. He said it will be a boon to the 10,000 Israelis with Type I or Type II diabetes who are dependent on insulin (2,000 of whom inject themselves regularly).

"There are also many diabetics who avoid insulin injections because they're afraid of them. The inhaled-insulin approach will be very convenient," he said, "and it's been shown to be as effective as injections."

Success of the first clinical trials using inhaled powdered insulin was disclosed at a meeting of the American Diabetes Association in Chicago this week. Dr. William Cefalu of the University of Vermont, who led one of the studies, said: "These studies present the first evidence that there are true alternative ways to administer insulin."

The technique, in which the life-saving hormone is sucked through the mouth into the lungs and rapidly absorbed into the bloodstream to control blood sugar levels, was called a "breakthrough" by Dr. Michael Bush, a diabetes expert in Beverly Hills, California. Developed by Inhaled Therapeutic Systems of San Carlos, California, it has been shown to cause no harm to the lungs.

Type I (juvenile-onset) diabetics currently need to inject themselves several times a day, while Type II diabetics control their condition by diet and drugs and some of them need occasional insulin injections, especially as they age and drugs become less effective.

The final phase of the trials on 1,000 subjects will begin in the US this fall, and the product can be on the market in two years.

Insulin can't be swallowed because it is destroyed by acids in the digestive system. Sniffing through the nose caused dosing problems, irritation in the nasal passages and erratic absorption of the hormone - especially if the patient had a cold.

But the new system, using a small device that allows the user to suck the controlled-release fine powder through the mouth into the lungs, just requires normal breathing. Besides avoiding needles, the powder can be kept anywhere, unlike injectable insulin, which has to be refrigerated.

Studies showed that blood sugar levels in diabetics who used the powder were identical to those who injected themselves. Type I patients will still have to give themselves a single injection of slow-acting insulin before going to bed.

Iran not yet ready to reconcile with Israel

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN

While Tehran understands that the road to easing US sanctions against Iran goes through Israel, the Iranian government is not yet ready to reconcile with the Jewish state, a former security aide from the US Reagan Administration said yesterday.

Geoffrey Kemp of the Nixon Center for Peace and Freedom, a think tank in Washington, said in a speech at a conference held in Herzliya to mark the 20th anniversary of the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, that a US policy of political containment toward Tehran has failed.

"The US found itself alone in its desire to politically isolate Iran," Kemp said. He added that American sanctions did, however, damage Iran's oil industry.

"Iranians understand that the easiest way to reduce sanctions and influence Congress is to improve relations with Israel, but they can't yet do it at this time," Kemp said.

He said that although American-Iranian relations are slowly improving it will take time before the Iranian government is ready to talk formally in a bilateral context with Washington.

Controversial Haifa project to continue

By DAVID RUDGE

Work is to continue on the second phase of the controversial Carmel Beach Towers hotels complex along Haifa's coast in accordance with a decision of the National Building and Planning Commission.

The commission on Tuesday reaffirmed the permit granted for the construction of the Pearl, an apartment-hotel, alongside the existing Corsi Hotel at Hof Hacarmel, said a spokesman for the builders, the Carmel Beach company.

Conservationists, while conceding that the commission had enabled more building at the hotel itself, said they had scored a victory because it also ruled against additional building nearby.

The spokesman for the building company said the commission had effectively rejected the appeal.

He said the company now intends to resume sales of the 181 units in the apartment-hotel, around 50 of which had been sold prior to an injunction imposed by the court pending the decision of the national building and planning commission.

Bilha Givon, head of the coastline and maritime division of the Society for the Protection of Nature, said the commission's ruling meant that a proposed extension including more shops, a restaurant, dining room and additional apartments would not be able to go ahead.

The conservationists had appealed against the project's construction, which has been under way for several months, on the grounds that it breaches coastline building and planning regulations. This, despite its being approved previously by the local, regional and national planning commissions.

The appeal was initially lodged with the Haifa District Court, which referred the matter back to the National Building and Planning Commission for a decision to be made.

Jewish groups to boycott talks with Swiss banks

By MARILYN HENRY and news agencies

Jewish organizations are apparently prepared to boycott negotiations next week in Washington with Switzerland's three major commercial banks, maintaining that their offer to settle Holocaust-era claims is unacceptably low, according to published accounts.

American public finance officials have again raised the prospect of imposing sanctions against Swiss banks.

Credit Suisse, Union Bank of Switzerland and the Swiss Bank Corporation face three class-action lawsuits in the US for some $20 billion, and parallel demands from the World Jewish Congress for "moral and material restitution."

A settlement among the banks, survivors' lawyers and representatives of Jewish organizations had appeared imminent two weeks ago, around the time when Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress, had been quoted by The Forward weekly as saying that the banks would agree to a settlement of about $3 billion.

Despite a confidentiality agreement intended to ensure the privacy of the talks, a series of leaks have estimated the expected settlement amount as between $1 billion and $1.6 billion.

Later it was said, however, that this sum would likely include funds already intended for resolving other war-era claims, including payments to survivors and heirs of dormant Swiss accounts and administrative expenses for the forensic audit of Swiss banks.

As a result, the actual cash settlement offer could turn out to be in the vicinity of only $500 million.

The next settlement talks are scheduled for June 23 in Washington. The talks, mediated by US Undersecretary of State Stuart Eizenstat, began last December. They were launched under the threat of sanctions by US public finance officials, who have threatened at three-month intervals to withdraw public funds from Swiss banks and to limit Swiss participation in bond offerings.

Eizenstat has repeatedly said that sanctions are unwarranted and would be counterproductive. A committee of state and local financial officers, headed by New York City Comptroller Alan Hevesi, is to meet on July 1 in New York to decide whether to lift a moratorium it placed on sanctions against Swiss banks.

The finance officers however have seen their clout diminished by disunity and competition within their ranks. The New Jersey legislature, for example, already passed its own sanctions measure, independent of the deadline suggested by Hevesi's committee.

Hevesi also heads the Jewish fraternal group B'nai Zion, which belongs to the WJC.

The WJC has dangled the prospect of sanctions for two years.

Wiesenthal: Report that Swiss supported the Nazis biased

VIENNA (Reuters) - Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal yesterday dismissed as biased a report bearing his name which condemns neutral Switzerland as a land of Nazi sympathizers during World War Two.

In a telephone interview, Wiesenthal said the report by US historian Alan Schom, which was produced by the Los Angeles-based Wiesenthal Center, painted an unbalanced picture of wartime Switzerland.

"To paint a real picture and a true picture, you must talk about the minuses and about the pluses," he said from his office in Vienna.

The report, based largely on two sets of minutes of meetings between a top government official and a pro-Nazi group, and on a border patrol circular on immigration, accuses the Swiss government of helping the Nazis choke off a flight from Germany.

Asked if the report, "Survey of Nazi and Pro-Nazi Groups in Switzerland, 1930-1945", was substantial enough to say that most Swiss sympathized with the Nazis and not the Allies, Wiesenthal replied: "No, absolutely not."

"When you do something because you are worried about being occupied, that is not a matter of sympathy," According to one document, in the minutes of a 1942 meeting, Eduard von Steiger of the Swiss Ministry of Justice discussed with the Swiss Fatherland Association the idea of "enlightening" the Swiss people to the dangers of immigration.

ISRAEL AIRPORTS AUTHORITY

BEN GURION 2000 PROJECT

Public Tender no. C40100 52 Airside Siteworks Civil Contract

The Israel Airports Authority (IAA) hereby requests proposals from qualified Offerors meeting the below listed Pre-Conditions for the Construction of the Airside Siteworks Civil Work for the Ben Gurion 2000 Project. The Work of this Contract generally includes managing and performing the finish grading, sub-base preparation, asphalt paving, concrete hardstands, extension of jet-fuel piping system, and selected utilities in the Airside of the new terminal.

Preliminary Mandatory Requirements: This list summarizes the Pre-Conditions for an Offeror's Proposal to be Considered by the IAA. Only the complete language of the Pre-Conditions as stated in the RFP is binding. This text may be obtained by written request, submitted on company letterhead, to the PMF facsimile number stated below.

- Offeror shall be registered with the Contractors Registrar of the State of Israel under the classification of Group C, Branch B 209, Type 5 (Unlimited). A foreign Offeror shall provide the information required in the RFP, Exhibit A.
- Offeror's minimum annual revenue from construction work in each of the last three (3) years was not less than the equivalent of Thirty Five Million U.S. Dollars ($35 Million).
- Offeror's records must indicate, for each of the last three (3) years, the cost paid directly for labor for at least eighty (80) persons (annual average).
- Offeror has completed a minimum of:
 - Two (2) asphalt road projects of the equivalent of Eight Million Dollars ($8 Million) within the last five (5) years; and
 - One (1) concrete apron project of at least 100,000 square meters in size, within the last five (5) years.
- Offeror shall meet the staffing and personnel experience requirements specified in the RFP, Exhibit A.
- Offeror shall meet the registration requirements for a legal entity stated in the RFP, Exhibit A.
- Offeror shall meet the VAT and Israeli Tax Authorities' registration requirements stated in the RFP, Exhibit A.
- Offeror shall provide an unconditional Bank Guarantee in the amount of Fifteen (15) Million New Israeli Shekels (NIS), valid for a minimum of ninety (90) days from the Proposal Submission date, as specified in the RFP, Exhibit E.
- Joint Ventures are allowed to participate in the Tender in accordance with the conditions stated in the RFP, Part B, Section 2 and Exhibit A.
- Offeror, if a foreign entity, shall sign a Commercial Cooperation Undertaking.

Additional Preliminary requirements:

participation in the Tender Process is subject to the Offeror's satisfying all Preliminary Requirements as detailed in the Mandatory Tender Regulations (1993), Clause 6 (a), (1), (2) and (3).

Proposal Documents: Tender Documents may be purchased until the Proposal Submission Date for the non-refundable amount of Nineteen Thousand, Five Hundred New Israeli Shekels (19,500 NIS), including VAT.

Tender Documents are available from the Project Management Firm (PMF) Project Office located at Ben Gurion Airport starting 15 June, 1998 between the hours of 09:00 and 12:00, business days (Sunday through Thursday). Interested Offerors must contact the PMF Contracts Administrator, Mr. Amnon Yashpe at telephone number: 972-3-977-4464 (fax no. 972-3-977-2956) a minimum of 48 hours in advance to arrange site access. Interested parties may preview the Tender Documents prior to their purchase.

All qualifying Proposals shall be delivered in sealed envelopes/packages not later than 16:00 hours local time on or before 4 August 1998, to the appropriate tender box located in the Archive of the Airports Authority, Main Office, 2nd Floor, Room No. 113, Ben Gurion International Airport, Israel.

A Pre-Proposal Conference will be held at the Ben Gurion 2000 Project Site Offices on 24 June 1998 at 12:00 to clarify provisions in the RFP documents, to summarize and present the Project and to respond to written questions posed by Offerors. Offerors are strongly encouraged to attend, but participation is not mandatory. Site access must be arranged in advance as stated in the RFP.

The IAA is not bound to accept the lowest Proposal or any Proposal whatsoever.

What next in Iraq?

A UN-Iraq agreement to try and complete the search for Iraqi weapons of mass destruction within two months shows the end of sanctions against Iraq is near.

So what's next? The stage is presently being set for the next crisis, probably in July and August, when the UN considers whether and how to pressure Iraq and ensure destruction of its weapons of mass destruction.

Chief UN weapons inspector Richard Butler was in Iraq this week working on verification. The Iraqis are demanding that all inspections end within a few months. "This will be the last round in the negotiations," said an Iraqi official.

The problems in checking the status of Iraq's nuclear, chemical and biological weaponry are complex, but can be summarized in a few simple principles.

In many cases, Iraq claims that it destroyed these weapons, unobserved by any outsiders. The credibility of this assertion is undermined, however, by repeated discoveries that Iraq was lying. The truth was uncovered by inspectors, by satellite photographs, by slips made by Iraqi officials or scientists during interviews, but most often from information supplied by Iraqi defectors.

When Iraq's version is contradicted by evidence, Iraq simply produces a new story.

In contrast to hiding the afkhaman, Iraq doesn't want the weapons and components to be found. Consequently, it permits searches where arms and incriminating documents are nonexistent, and denies permission to look where things are concealed.

For example, according to Butler, "From 1991 to 1995, Iraq categorically denied it had a biological weapons program." Only after the UN inspectors produced contradicting evidence in 1995 did Iraq acknowledge that such a program once existed. The new version — submitted with altered documents — was that far fewer substances were produced than indicated by records on raw materials imports and other production activities.

While continuing efforts to force Iraq compliance, now is the time to plan seriously for a post-sanctions situation. It is extremely unlikely that Saddam Hussein will try to turn the clock back to 1990, when he invaded Kuwait, or to 1980, when he attacked Iran. His short-term model is more likely to be the mid-1980s, when Iraq presented a kinder, gentler face to woo Western and Gulf Arab support for its war against Tehran.

What course, then, is Iraqi policy likely to take and how should the West or Israel respond? Iraq and investment: Ending sanctions should spark a rush of Western companies to invest in and sell to Iraq, complete with optimistic assessments for rapid economic development. But this could be misleading. Low prices and an oversupply of oil would give Saddam far less money than a few years ago. Moreover, risk and uncertainty — including the Iraqi government's own volatility — could discourage completion of actual deals.

• Iraq and the peace process: Iraq would probably be another Arab voice not only pessimistic about the peace process, but outright against it. Yasser Arafat would have to balance his love for Iraq with Baghdad's criticism of his policies.

• Iraq and Israel: Prospects for Israel-Iraq rapprochement are near zero, but a direct Iraqi threat to Israel would be almost equally unlikely. Baghdad could only menace Israel using weapons that it must claim not to have, and won't have for some years.

If Iraq tries too quickly to reassert its claim to lead an Arab struggle against Israel, the resulting suspicion among Arab states could undermine its acceptance by them.

• Iraq and the Gulf Arabs: While ostensibly Saudi Arabia and other Gulf Arab states would greet Saddam's comeback with a handshake, they will also be shaking in their boots. Better relations with Tehran and even with Israel — if there is some progress in the peace process — will seem more attractive.

• Iraq and Iran: Similarly, a bigger Iraqi threat might promote more moderation in Iran, which could view improved relations with the US as far more urgent. At the same time, a rearmament and reactivated Iraq would motivate Iran to step up its own programs to build weapons of mass destruction. Despite articles about Baghdad-Tehran cooperation or new friendliness, don't be deceived. The two states will remain real enemies and another war between them remains possible.

• Iraq and the Kurds: Within about 18 months, Saddam's armies would march back into the Kurdish areas of northern Iraq. Hundreds of thousands of Kurds would try to flee. The West would do little to help them and nothing at all to stop Iraq from crushing their autonomy. This crisis would set a bad precedent for Western credibility in the region or deterrence of Iraq.

• Iraq's secret weapons: programs: These would be restarted, but Baghdad might put a lower priority on them for a couple of years, in terms of resources and taking risks, until it feels more secure.

While anti-proliferation efforts would not be completely effective, the time Iraq needs to obtain these arms would be extended, especially in the case of nuclear weapons, from a year or two to six or more years.

Hate crime's latest peak

America is dumbfounded by the brutal murder of a disabled black passerby in Texas

By SUE ANNE PRESSLEY

JASPER, Texas — They were three troubled men out riding and drinking on a Saturday night.

John William King, 25, was the trio's unofficial leader, a foul-mouthed convicted burglar whose prison nickname was "Possum." Shawn Allen Berry, also 23, was King's former high school classmate and partner in crime. Lawrence Russell Brewer, 31, had served seven years on a cocaine conviction, released on condition he be treated for an undisclosed mental illness. All three had tattoos or personal items with the special markings of the white supremacist.

Before the night was over, authorities charge, the men sank to the depths of brutality, committing a murder so cruel and unthinkable that it has shocked residents of this East Texas town of 7,200 as well as the rest of the nation, drawn words of condemnation from President Clinton and left everyone asking what brought them to such a dark place.

After stopping in the wee hours of Sunday to give a ride to James Byrd Jr., 49, a disabled black man they saw walking on a downtown street, the men drove Byrd to a deserted country road, beat and kicked him, then chained him by his ankles to the back of their pickup and dragged him so violently that his head and right arm were wrenched from his body. Police found Byrd's denures, torn from his mouth, lying on the road. Blood smeared a trail a mile long.

The men were arrested later Sunday. But since then, through the media storm and the public outcry, only one of them — Berry, who also has cooperated with police and described the crime in an affidavit — has shown any remorse, according to Jasper County Sheriff Billy Rowles. Brewer and King were sullen, tough expressions as deputies led them into the courthouse this week, their orange jail jumpsuits covered with bullet-proof vests.

"Hate got into some young men," said Mayor R.C. Horn, who is black, grasping for an explanation.

Relatives of the three largely have refused to discuss the incident. In a letter of apology sent to the Fox News Channel, King's father, Ronald, who lives in Jasper, said to kill another "in such a manner is beyond any kind of reasoning. It hurts me deeply to know that a boy I raised and considered to be the most loved boy I knew could find it in himself to take a life."

A cousin of King's by marriage told reporters she never heard him use racial epithets as a youth, but was shocked recently when she ran into him in a local convenience store and saw that he was covered with tattoos, some apparently employing racist symbols. In a brief interview early this week with the Associated Press, Brewer's mother, Helen Brewer of Sulphur Springs, suggested that drinking had sent the men over the edge. "It couldn't do a dog that way," she said. "That just shows you what alcohol can do."

In certain basic ways, the three men matched the stereotype of perpetrators of hate crimes, according to experts who track such behavior. All three were high school dropouts who did not seem able to hold steady jobs, working variously as yard workers and lumber company employees; they were about to be evicted from the modest apartment they shared across from the local Wal-Mart. But perhaps most significant in their downward spiral were the racist influences they apparently encountered — and embraced — in prison.

Larry Fitzgerald, a spokesman for the Texas Department of Criminal Justice, said all three men, while serving time, were suspected of belonging to the Ku Klux Klan and the Confederate Knights of America.

But he could not confirm that they belonged to the Aryan Brotherhood, considered the most violent of prison hate groups. King, who was serving a sentence for burglary, was disciplined in 1995 for his involvement in a racial disturbance between whites and Hispanics at his prison unit, Fitzgerald said.

"We find the reason most people join a group like that is for support, for safety, protection. And birds of a feather flock together, of course," Fitzgerald said, adding that out of a Texas prison population of 142,785, nearly 5,000 inmates have been identified as having hate-group affiliations.

Authorities have not described the racist tattoos allegedly covering the men's skin, but Fitzgerald said the Aryan Brotherhood symbol involves the use of the initials, "A.B.," often intertwined or partially covered by other tattoos. A triangular-shaped symbol, actually the convergence of three K's, is the recognized symbol for the Klan. A cigarette lighter found at the murder scene that police say belonged to King had such a symbol etched on it.

In his statement to police, Berry also supplied a clue about the depth of King's racist beliefs. "We're starting 'The Turner Diaries' early," King allegedly said while dragging Byrd's body behind the truck. The Turner Diaries, a fictional account of race war in America, is seen as the bible of hate groups and apparently inspired convicted Oklahoma City bomber Timothy J. McVeigh.

"That's a pretty sophisticated statement for a racist to make; that's not a flippant statement," said Morris Dees of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks hate groups. "First of all, these men were drunk. But secondly, they were basically racists at heart and they had been influenced by Klan and neo-Nazi propaganda."

Dees and others — including Jasper officials and civil rights leader Jesse L. Jackson, who held a prayer meeting here and will return to preach at Byrd's funeral Saturday — have been quick to say the horrific crime could have happened anywhere and is no reflection on Jasper, which is near the Louisiana border 100 miles north-east of Houston. Forty-five percent of the residents of this prosperous lumber town are black, and several of its elected officials, in addition to the mayor, are black.

"There's nothing we see in this town that caused this to happen," Dees said. "It's a Southern town with built-in biases, but it's not a racist town." Nor is Texas a particular center for hate crimes, he said, although the general area of East Texas long has been a hotbed of Klan activity. Jasper lies 55 miles north of Vidor, where a Klan group in 1993 tried to prevent the integration of an all-white public housing development. Six of the 18 hate groups identified by Dees's agency as operating in Texas are headquartered in the eastern part of the state.

But Florida, with 48 identified hate groups, California, with 35, and even Illinois, with 26, outpace Texas.

According to FBI statistics, 10,702 hate crimes were reported in America in 1996, including 11 homicides. Because such crimes are erratically reported, Dees said, it is difficult to say whether they are on the increase. But hate groups are growing. In 1997, 474 hate groups were identified as operating in the United States, he said, a 20 percent jump over 1996.

What set the three Jasper men off is not yet fully known. It simply may have been a case of unfortunate circumstances, too much to drink, nothing to do, a lone black man on a dark street giving shape to all the thoughts the men had absorbed in prison.

Keshia Adkins, whom police identified as a girlfriend of King, told police she left King's apartment around 2 a.m. Sunday; the three men said they were leaving to visit a girl in the northern part of the county. Jasper resident Steve Scott said he saw Byrd, who did not own a car and was known to go everywhere in town on foot, walking down the street around 2:30 a.m.; a few minutes later he noticed a gray late-model truck pass his home, with Byrd sitting in the back, and two or three white men in the front.

Shawn Berry told police in the affidavit he recognized Byrd and offered him a ride, upsetting King. After stopping at a convenience store, King took the wheel and eventually turned down a dirt road.

When Berry asked King what he was doing, he replied that he wanted to give a "scare" to Byrd, whom he referred to with a racial slur.

King stopped the truck. Berry said, then King and Brewer got out and began beating Byrd until he was nearly unconscious. Alarmed, Berry said he ran a short distance away. A few minutes later, he came back and got in the truck, and King started to drive away, noting that Byrd was "bouncing all over the place." Not knowing what King was talking about, Berry said he turned and saw to his horror that the man was being dragged by a chain behind the truck.

Berry said he immediately asked King to let him out of the truck, but said King gave him a warning, "You're just as guilty as we are." Berry said King told him, "Authorities have said the men were drinking. That may have made them careless about covering their tracks. At the murder scene, police found, in addition to Byrd's wallet, shirt and tennis shoes, a number of items: the cigarette lighter with the Klan symbol, several unopened beers, a compact disc by the rock group Kiss, and a wrench with Berry's name etched on it. A spatter of blood was found on the undercarriage of the truck."

AGENDA

"It is unclear how a conference in which the Israelis and Palestinians are not participants can promote American efforts."

The Americans further noted that "the timing is particularly important, as there are currently American proposals on the table and this conference may harm these efforts."

"On the other hand, the US could understand the value of a conference of this type if it were to reaffirm a breakthrough which may be achieved in the context of the American proposals. In this case, we would be prepared to relate to such a possibility," the Clinton administration added.

If we compare the wording of the American protest with the sharp, public statement sent to Jerusalem regarding the demolitions of Palestinian homes, Jewish construction, and populating of the area of the Old City, the tone clearly weighs against Israel.

It is not every day that a country issues a sharp diplomatic statement of the demarche type. It is not every day that the State Department spokesman hints at a new deadline laid down before a friendly nation for fulfilling Washington's demands. It is not every day that the secretary of state calls a prime minister across the ocean and warns him about the serious implications in delaying an agreement drawn up based on a US political model.

The American protest transmitted to the Europeans pales in comparison with the sharp language used against Israel. It basically expresses some thoughts on the prospect of damage being done to Washington's activity in the Middle East, while stressing that the US sympathizes with European reservations about the Israeli government's behavior.

The US is mainly concerned that Paris and Cairo could provide Israel with an excuse to divert pressure away from making a decision on the size of the redeployment. In other words, America's main problem is the timing rather than the content.

The American Threat

Among the goodies which Israel was promised during the policy of restraint adopted by the government of former prime minister Yitzhak Shamir during the Gulf War was a guarantee to provide Israel with US military equipment of the "draw down" type at a cost of $500 million, in addition to other defense aid.

Several months later, when the Ministry of Defense asked the Pentagon to fulfill its undertaking, it came up against countless delays. The Israeli Embassy in Washington found that Israel's request had received all necessary approval from the head of the Israeli desk through the Middle East Department and up to deputy secretary of defense Paul Wolfowitz.

When the request landed on then-defense secretary Dick Cheney's desk, however, he ordered his subordinates to drag out the process until after the Israeli election. In 1992, this was one of the methods used to punish Shamir for his refusal to bow to American dictates.

A reverse example: More than a year later, a serious problem arose at the Port of Eilat while the multinational force was checking ships entering the Gulf of Aqaba so as to enforce an embargo of goods to Iraq. These inspections made it very difficult to use the port and Israeli ships came to prefer using the Suez Canal rather than trying to dock in Eilat. As a result, unemployment rose in Eilat and the ensuing anger was directed against the prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

The Washington embassy was asked to intervene and the military attaché explained to his colleagues in the Pentagon that ships sailing for Eilat should no longer be checked "in order to protect Rabin." Despite the awkwardness that this request created between the US and Jordan, the inspections were halted within a week.

This action provides proof that the Americans are not innocent of playing political games with a friendly nation such as Israel. And this may be nothing in comparison with the game played by the Clinton administration on the eve of the 1995 elections.

American pressure has even does not necessarily have to focus on the political arena. At the opening session of the strategic conference held this week at Tel Aviv University, together with the Center for Strategic Studies and the Center for International Relations at Harvard University, Prof. Shai Feldman discussed the repercussions of a delay in implementing the American proposal on the redeployment.

A partial response was given at a day-long seminar about prospects for Israeli-US relations in the next 50 years, sponsored by the Herzl Center for Middle East Research at the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev in Beer-Sheva.

Zvi Rabinovitch, the Israeli Embassy in Washington, former congressional delegate, warned Israel not to put too much "trust" in relations with the administration. In a reference to the political use being made by Netanyahu's government of support for Israel on Capitol Hill, Rabinovitch stressed that it would be risky for the government to promote its initiatives and policies solely via Congress and that it should remember that it is the administration which sets policy. Rabinovitch made the distinction between how can the threat of a redeployment of Israeli troops be used as a political tool and how can it be used as a political tool. Rabinovitch stressed that it would be risky for the government to promote its initiatives and policies solely via Congress and that it should remember that it is the administration which sets policy. Rabinovitch made the distinction

Professor Shai Feldman — What are repercussions of delay?

Rabinovitch stressed that it would be risky for the government to promote its initiatives and policies solely via Congress and that it should remember that it is the administration which sets policy. Rabinovitch made the distinction gle for loan guarantees on the eve of the 1992 elections. American Jews turned their backs on both Shamir and Bush.

Nevertheless, the question posed by Prof. Feldman at Tel Aviv University dealt with a deeper level of ties — the positive atmosphere which is a prerequisite for protecting the strategic interests of both Israel and the US.

With respect to the need to maintain a positive atmosphere, Israel faces a couple of overlapping dilemmas, one of them also involving Moscow. The Americans as well as Israel are concerned about Russia's tremendous arsenal of nuclear, chemical, and biological arms in addition to its ballistic weapons capability. Yet how can the West effectively prevent a proliferation of weapons and leaks of know-how to regimes and insane terrorist groups, without undermining Russian political stability?

The Israeli response to this strategic threat relies considerably on the US. In the political sphere, American assistance is essential to bringing pressure to bear on Russia. Israel's nuclear deterrent also rests on its influence in Washington and the ability to maintain close cooperation. Israel needs the Americans to show tolerance for its nuclear policy.

It needs aid to develop active defense systems such as the Arrow missile project, 72 percent of which is being financed by the American taxpayer. It cannot survive without satellite intelligence and real-time warnings. Its offensive options are dependent on supplies from Washington — such as the F-15 jet fighter — and sometimes defensive means have to be supplied by the US, such as the gas masks that were rushed over during the last Iraqi crisis. US Ambassador to Israel Edward Walker stressed this week once again that the US is committed to Israel's very existence and security and that pressure on Israel exists only in the imagination of those who wish to mislead the public.

A senior American official this week explained to me that in his view the Arabs do not have an effective military option against Israel right now. If the peace process fails, discussions about the Middle East may revert to the UN Security Council and General Assembly. Iran may encourage terrorism. There was no hint of any potential harm to strategic cooperation — at the very most, diplomatic steps, a demarche here and there or a public declaration of one kind or another: "Not very pleasant, but nothing disastrous."

The defense establishment, however, is concerned about a more abstract impact such as damage to the atmosphere of relations. We won't always be able to put our finger on it, but tensions could arise and cause delays on essential issues. They believe that this could be even more serious than the size of the redeployment. All ministers of defense have appreciated this.

There is an element of frustration that other ideas have not been tried out, that Sharon's proposal for territorial continuity at the expense of the size of the redeployment was not considered. That there have been no in-depth discussions. But they all understand that the rope with the US cannot be pulled too tight.

The Egyptian Angle

On Sunday afternoon Labor MK Yossi Beilin flew to Cairo, returning to Tel Aviv the same evening. The few hours which he spent in a hotel adjacent to the airport were filled with meetings with Osama Baz, President Hosni Mubarak's close adviser.

The principal message was: Egypt is seriously concerned about Yasser Arafat's internal situation in view of increasing criticism of him in the Palestinian Legislative Council, due to the delays in the peace process and the encouragement which Sheikh Ahmed Yassin received during his tour of Arab countries, while the Americans remained silent.

The truth is that criticism of Arafat in the Palestinian parliament in Ramallah is mainly about complaints of mismanagement and corruption. The basic facts, however, are true: Arafat is undergoing a difficult period politically and an agreement with Israel could help him somewhat.

The following day, and at his request, opposition leader Ehud Barak met with Mubarak. They cried on each other's shoulders about what they called Netanyahu's tactics. The calls made by the prime minister to the opposition to decide "who is against whom" and which side of the fence they stand on when it comes to serving national interests are not unreasonable. Such calls were also made by the Rabin-Peres government whenever Netanyahu met with King Hussein.

Today there is a tendency to forget that he was accused at the time of suggesting to the Arabs that they wait for him to be elected to office, as his proposals would be better. Netanyahu's procrastination, however, is not just wearing the Americans down, but also our Palestinian partner. Even if we find it hard to empathize with the Palestinians, they are a partner. It is precisely this which concerns not just Cairo, but Washington, too.

Japan, US promise to halt yen's slide

By WILLIAM HALLARD

TOKYO (Reuters) - Japan and the United States agreed yesterday that the two economic superpowers had to act together to stop a nosedive in the Japanese yen that had sparked fears of an Asia-wide depression that could turn global.

Their promises were backed up by an earlier round of concerted intervention in the market, estimated by traders at $2 billion, that drove the yen sharply higher.

The statement by the two leaders came a few hours after Japan's parliament passed a special 4.65 trillion yen ($32.7 billion) supplementary budget that is part of a record 16.65 trillion yen economic stimulus package announced in April.

The announcement by US President Bill Clinton and Prime Minister Ryutaro Hashimoto appeared to end for now an increasingly bitter war of words about what Japan should do to stimulate its long-suffering economy and rescue a currency showing no end to its decline.

"The president and I are delighted to see that the United States and Japan have cooperated in the exchange markets to support a strong, stable yen," Hashimoto said in a statement after a telephone talk with Clinton.

The statement came a day ahead of a hastily arranged visit by US Deputy Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers that will include a meeting of finance officials from the Group of Seven industrialized nations.

Financial analysts had said that if Summers came to Japan without some sort of deal, he threatened to worsen the situation.

A Chinese official said earlier on Wednesday that the sliding yen could force China to devalue the yuan, the first such warning of the threats posed by the yen's slide. China has blamed both Japan and the United States for the growing crisis.

The intervention marks a reversal for Washington, which had said that only an improvement in the Japanese economy would halt the yen's fall to a string of eight-year lows.

It was the first time US authorities intervened on behalf of the yen since February 1992.

US Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin said the intervention took place "in the context of Japan's plans to strengthen its economy" and said the United States was ready to continue the action if needed.

Hashimoto and other Japanese government officials have meanwhile been stressing the need to wait for the now-enacted economic stimulus package, saying it will boost the economy by at least two percent and ensure a recovery by autumn.

But many economists doubt the fiscal stimulus will do more than give growth a temporary boost, while failing to resolve the basic problems plaguing Japan's banking system and economy.

Bank of Japan Policy Board member Susumu Taketomi said on Wednesday that resolving financial institutions' problem loans was the key to restoring confidence, a point later echoed in Hashimoto's statement.

"The government of Japan will expeditiously restructure the financial system, including the prompt disposal of bad assets and the abandonment of the "convoy" system (of protecting problem companies), Hashimoto said in his statement.

"We will also accelerate the implementation of the fiscal stimulus package and reform both corporate and individual income tax structures," he said.

BOJ governor Masaru Hayami, in a rare gesture, issued a statement on Tuesday urging banks to disclose their internal views on the health of potentially problem loans, to which private bankers responded sceptically.

Finance Minister Hikaru Matsunaga sided with the banks, although he said he shares the BOJ's view that the problem loans are choking the economy.

Critics said the rare statement by the BOJ may be an indication that the central bank's options to help the economy or support the excessively weak yen were limited, with Japan's official discount rate already at a record low 0.5 percent.

While the release of minutes of the BOJ's April 24 policy meeting revealed that many had pushed for cautious consideration of easier credit, the central bank decided last week to keep the current monetary policy unchanged.

In a sign of the persistent worries about Japan's banking system, the share price of the Long-Term Credit Bank of Japan plunged on Wednesday as rumors about financial difficulties - denied by the bank - set off a wave of selling.

Matsunaga told parliament no Japanese bank was currently in danger of failure, but such assurances are unlikely to calm Japan's jittery.

Efforts are underway by the ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) to resolve the bad loan woes of the nation's banks, and senior party officials have raised the idea of using more public loans to help the banks besides the 30 trillion yen currently set aside for that purpose.

"We will tell him (Summers) that Japan is doing its best to solve the bad loan problem," government spokesman Kanezo Muraoka said earlier yesterday.

Markets, meanwhile, were also waiting for word of whether Japan's top financial diplomat, Eisuke Sakakibara, and Summers' counterpart, was going to stay in his post for another year.

His post was not among personnel changes announced yesterday, but officials said more reshuffling could come after parliament concludes today.

US seeks pact with China to end nuclear threat

By JIM WOLF

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - US officials preparing for President Bill Clinton's trip to China next week are seeking a deal that would prevent Beijing and Washington from targeting each other with nuclear weapons, the White House said on Tuesday.

China has rejected such initiatives in the past on the grounds that the United States first should agree to a nuclear "no first use" pledge, something that would fly in the face of US deterrence strategy.

White House spokesman Mike McCurry said the US was seeking a nuclear "deterrence" deal modelled on one announced by Clinton and Russian President Boris Yeltsin in 1994.

"It would be similar to and it would be designed for the same purpose," McCurry told reporters.

He said the idea was to enhance security and contribute to Sino-American "confidence building."

McCurry declined to speculate about the prospects of a deal being announced by Clinton and President Jiang Zemin at their summit in Beijing in 11 days.

He said nuclear deterrence was one of the issues now being worked on in Beijing in 11-hour pre-summit talks led by Sandra Kristoff, the US National Security Council staff director for Asia.

Deterrence is largely - but not entirely - a symbolic gesture, military experts said, because nuclear-tipped missiles normally can be re-targeted in as little as an hour or less.

Defense Department spokesman Kenneth Bacon said an agreement would reduce the "hair-trigger" aspect of nuclear weaponry. But he said he did not anticipate a change in US unwillingness to forswear possible "first use" of nuclear weapons, calling this a "key" to deterrent strategy.

"What it means is that if there were to be an accidental launch of some sort - we believe that the chances of an accidental launch are extremely minute - the missile would not be targeted at a specific place," Bacon told reporters at the Pentagon. "It would go off into the ocean or something like that."

The issue here is to find ways to reduce the hair-trigger aspect of the strategic nuclear arsenals and that's why we think the agreement we have with Russia is significant and that's why we think a similar agreement with China would help stabilize the nuclear balance," he said.

Bruce Blair, of the private Brookings Institution, a former US nuclear missile launch officer who has written extensively on targeting, said land-based US missiles were programmed exclusively to hit targets in the former Soviet Union, mainly Russia, despite the 1994 denuclearization accord.

China was taken out of the US strategic war plan in the early 1980s and had not been reinstated, though US missile-launching submarines carry target coordinates for both China and Russia that could be programmed in about 15 minutes, Blair said in a telephone interview.

McCurry declined to discuss US targeting posture and targeting doctrine.

"We live in a world of deterrence," he said in reply to a question.

The Central Intelligence Agency has concluded that 13 of China's 18 nuclear intercontinental ballistic missiles have been targeted on US cities, the Washington Times reported on May 1. Any such calculation may be based on the angles of shadows picked up by US spy satellites, officials have said.

Bacon said former defense secretary William Perry had urged the Chinese to agree to a denuclearization agreement during a December 1996 visit to Beijing.

Russian hopes of glory hinge on Milosevic

MOSCOW (Reuters) - Russia is hailing its success in squeezing promises of concessions out of Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic over Kosovo as a diplomatic triumph that could end bloodshed and avert NATO military intervention.

But President Boris Yeltsin's hopes of nothing up one of his few foreign policy successes since the Soviet Union collapsed now lie largely in the hands of a man who has wriggled out of promises before and inspires little trust abroad.

Milosevic would put Moscow in an awkward position by not carrying out his promises, robbing it of the credibility it has won as a mediator in the Kosovo crisis and leaving it facing a rift with the West over the use of force to end the violence.

"To some extent this is a success for Mr. Yeltsin's foreign policy. Russia now has a role as a symbolic defender of Serbia and will try to keep playing a role," said Viktor Kremenyuk, deputy director of Moscow's USA and Canada Institute think tank.

But asked if Milosevic would carry out his promises, Kremenyuk told Reuters: "Not necessarily. He will try to strike some more bargains. He still has some room for maneuver, although not very much."

The West turned to Yeltsin in frustration after its own efforts failed to end a police crackdown against independence-minded Albanians in the southern Serbian province.

The plea for help was in itself a boost for Yeltsin, who is trying - largely in vain - to regain the lost glories of superpower status which Moscow enjoyed in Soviet days.

"The Kosovo problem is not going to be resolved without our involvement," Yeltsin said on Tuesday, clearly revelling in his role as a mediator for world powers, granted because of Russia's traditional ties with its fellow Slavs in Belgrade.

Milosevic promised to meet most of the demands set last week by world powers for ending the bloodshed in Kosovo.

Yeltsin won praise for his efforts from US President Bill Clinton and scored points with communists and nationalists in parliament who praised him, despite usually being his foes.

If Milosevic does carry out his promises, Yeltsin would appear justified in taking much of the credit for the breakthrough - although NATO air exercises near Kosovo the day Milosevic arrived in Moscow also clearly had an effect.

In fact, Yeltsin had little option but to mediate with Milosevic - it offered him a chance to show nationalist politicians, and ordinary Russians, that Moscow had done its best to resolve the crisis and avert NATO military intervention.

"The West is largely regarded as unfriendly now in Russia."

The feeling is that if the West is seen as anti-Serbian, Russia must be pro-Serbian," said Kremenyuk.

But Western governments have reacted with little enthusiasm, largely because of Milosevic's refusal to withdraw security forces immediately and their lack of faith in him after their dealings with Belgrade during the 1992-95 war in Bosnia.

The danger for Yeltsin is that if Milosevic breaks his word, it would deal another blow to Moscow's global authority and wipe out much of what it believes it has achieved.

"Convincing the West that Milosevic has made serious concessions will not be easy for Russia. In fact, it could be impossible," said the Kommersant Daily newspaper.

"There is still a real possibility of NATO bomb strikes after Milosevic's 'blitz' visit to Moscow but now the NATO bombers could have a negative effect on Russia's authority. By signing up for a vague formula, Moscow has let itself be manipulated by Milosevic."

Annual report: Human rights declaration ignored

LONDON (AP) - The Universal Declaration of Human Rights remains all but meaningless for most of the world's people half a century after it was proclaimed by the UN General Assembly, Amnesty International said in its annual report released yesterday.

The international human rights organization said it had documented cases of summary executions in at least 55 nations, the detention of prisoners of conscience in 87 nations and torture in 117 countries.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights "has been called 'the world's best-kept secret,' the world's best-kept secret," said Pierre Sané, secretary-general of Amnesty International.

"Our current campaign to promote the UDHR in the run-up to the 10 December anniversary hopes to change that," Amnesty International said that many governments have challenged the notion of human rights which apply equally in all nations. Some Asian and African nations, for instance, have argued that international human rights standards reflect Western ideas.

The United States also has been reluctant to embrace international standards, it said.

"It stands virtually alone in not signing up to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child," the report said of the United States. "It is one of the few countries which has not ratified the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. Even when it has ratified international human rights conventions, it has often entered extensive reservations, refusing to be bound by many of the provisions within them."

The report said that economic rights and the rights of women continued to be neglected.

Helping Africa help itself

Poor Africa. Less than three months after President Bill Clinton's highly publicized visit, the continent has sunk back into obscurity. The Middle East, Asia's financial crisis, Indonesia and the Indian-Pakistani nuclear contest have driven most of Africa's problems out of the world spotlight. Only the reports of turmoil continue unabated.

Will Clinton's promise of US aid still be fulfilled? The possibility is less than propitious amid criticism that the African Growth and Opportunity Act is merely a bill offering benefits to multinational corporations rather than doing good for Africa.

South Africa's President Nelson Mandela has said that the bill is "not acceptable."

Clinton's promise and the consequent hope it spurred brings one back 36 years, when a spurt of US interest in Africa led to the adoption of an enlightened policy. Unfortunately, it was never carried out.

Had the US put its intentions into practice at that time, Africa could have been very different today. It may even have avoided being stigmatized as a basket case continent of ruined economies, mass poverty and disease.

The story started with a March 1962 State Department document issued by the Secretary of State "for the guidance of all concerned in the conduct of US foreign policy and operations." The guidelines were a product of the John F. Kennedy presidency when Washington was dominated by idealism and the belief that America had the power to effect positive change.

Yet the policy was anything but starry-eyed. Prepared in the Cold War era, the policy's aim was, to insure Western, and especially American, influence in Africa while keeping the former Soviet Union and its Eastern bloc countries at bay.

Each of the document's 38 pages was marked "Secret" until declassification 14 years later and only a few scholars seem to be aware of its existence.

Prophetically, the guidelines began by saying: "What we do - or fail to do - in Africa in the next year or two will have a profound effect for many years to come."

"With few notable exceptions, the independent states of Africa (29 at present, with more to come) are new, inexperienced, intensely nationalistic, revealing in their attitudes the scars of a colonial past. Dangerous instability is certain for a long time to come."

The guidelines went on to argue that America's "own revolutionary background and democratic aspirations - when we live up to them - constitute a basis for sympathy between ourselves and the Africans."

Looking back from today's perspective, it is clear that the planned basic strategy of some 30 years past could have transformed Africa by fostering "long-term positive trends in education, in social and economic development, in the shaping of effective political institutions, and in regional cooperation."

OPINION

By Benjamin Posen

The document stressed that the aim of the policy was to offer a wide range of practical help to foster democracy and development while avoiding an arms race in Africa with the Soviet Union.

Through a "prompt and major effort," said the guidelines, "we hope to make the most of our present opportunity to enlarge areas of common interest, while respecting the African desire to remain truly independent and uncommitted in the Cold War."

"Aside from tangible assistance," said the guidelines, "the most helpful things we could do to enhance our image and obtain the friendship of the African people are (a) to make our commitment to freedom in Africa clear without peradventure of doubt in such cases as Angola, Algeria and South Africa; and (b) to move more quickly to solve our problem of according dignity and equal opportunity to our own African-descended population."

The guidelines urged action against minority regimes and set 1972 - a mere ten years into the future - as the target date for ending white rule in South Africa and what was then Rhodesia, as well as terminating Portuguese colonial rule in Mozambique and Angola.

Short-term goals called on African governments to come up with plans for realistic development and the use of "politically disinterested" foreign aid within two years. To help fragile African economies emerge from colonialism, the policy included programs aimed at reducing excessive price fluctuations of tropical and primary products plus marketing agreements.

Few of the high hopes of 1962 came to pass and Africa itself was to blame. Nearly all the leaders who had taken their nations into freedom found power and office irresistible and went on to destroy democracy and plunder their people.

THE US, through its own acts of commission and omission, also contributed massively to the continent's decline. With the Cold War becoming more of an influence on US policy than the State Department guidelines, Washington ended up supporting tyrannical and corrupt regimes in the name of keeping the Soviet Union at bay. Giving aid for development to such regimes became a practical impossibility.

The Vietnam War further exacerbated the growing decline of Washington's policy in Africa, by causing the US to turn in on itself and away from far-off, increasingly nasty places in the world.

The commitment to working against minority regimes also dissipated, notably in regard to South Africa. Washington was at best ineffective, as in the years of President Jimmy Carter, or supportive of white minority rule during the 1980s years of President Ronald Reagan.

Cold War fears led to cooperation with white South Africa known as "constructive engagement" and induced the US to connive in delaying independence for Namibia, with the loss of lives that this meant. More seriously, it led to perpetuation of the civil war in neighboring Angola that laid waste to that country.

Perhaps now, it will all be different. Perhaps now, free of the Cold War, there will be a real consciousness among Americans that the world is interconnected and that Africa needs a helping hand as a partner and not as an inferior. Perhaps, too, consciousness will spread among Africans that they are first and foremost responsible for their progress.

The lives of nearly 800 million people in 54 African nations are at stake.

The writer, formerly deputy editor of the Rand Daily Mail in Johannesburg, is director of the Center for Social Concern at Yeshiva University, Jerusalem.

BALAAM'S PROPHECY
Eyewitness to History: 1939-1989
by Naphtali Lau-Lavie. New York,
London: Cornwall Books. 496 pp.
$24.95.

By Allan E. Shapiro

Balaam's prophecy, in its biblical telling, is a tale full of ambiguities. Here it refers to Israel's resurrection after the Holocaust, with prophetic praises coming where curses were intended. In the biblical formulation, "the people shall rise as a great lion." "Lion" is a translation of the family name of the author.

As implied in the English title and even more explicitly in the original Hebrew version, published by Ma'ariv in 1993 as Ami K'Lavie, a central theme is the intertwining of the national and family sagas. Lavie's autobiography spans his survival in the death camps of Poland, his arrival in pre-independence Israel, and his subsequent career as spokesman, adviser, and diplomat. Not only is this autobiography as history; it is history with the plot of a novel.

Lavie's father, rabbi of Piotrkow, the Polish town where the Nazis established the first ghetto in occupied Poland, and scion of a distinguished rabbinical dynasty, entrusted into the author's care his younger brother, Yisrael Meir, first introduced into the story as the five-year-old sits on the floor of the family apartment, building a tower out of wooden blocks. It concludes with the author's mission accomplished: Israel Meir Lau prays at the Western Wall in Jerusalem, as he prepares to enter upon his duties as Ashkenazi chief rabbi. "I feel it was this mission, the mission to bring this brother to safety from the abyss of despair to the gates of hope — to the Promised Land and thereby guarantee the continuation of our rabbinic dynasty, that kept me alive and gave me the will to fight for our lives rather than to succumb to the fate that befell so many of us."

In the original Hebrew version, this book is subtitled "Autobiography." In the English translation, this is changed to "Eyewitness to History: 1939-1989." Leaving aside the obvious distinction that Lavie's autobiography is a history of his family, his "brother's" role is central, and includes an absorbing and far from irrelevant account of the family history, there is a somewhat different thrust to the sort of account that the two terms imply. As a youth in Poland, separated from his family, entrusted with the fate of his younger brother, surviving in the hell of the Holocaust, his account has the immediacy of personal experience and grips the reader with all the force of direct participation.

By contrast, in his public career in Israel, Lavie seems indeed to play the role of eyewitness, with the "outsider" status this implies. He remains essentially in the professional role upon which he first embarked in his initial career as an adult — that of journalist. He makes his mark as spokesman, first and foremost in the Defense Ministry, thereafter in the Foreign Ministry, for Moshe Dayan, later as adviser to leaders on both sides of the political divide, such as Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Shamir. Only in his final farewell to public life does he assume the independent office of consul-general in New York with the role of eyewitness, with the "outsider" status this implies. He remains essentially in the professional role upon which he first embarked in his initial career as an adult — that of journalist. He makes his mark as spokesman, first and foremost in the Defense Ministry, thereafter in the Foreign Ministry, for Moshe Dayan, later as adviser to leaders on both sides of the political divide, such as Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Shamir. Only in his final farewell to public life does he assume the independent office of consul-general in New York with the rank of ambassador, as plenipotentiary to the power center of Jewish communal life in the United States.

It can perhaps be taken as an indication that public relations remains his fascination for the author that Balaam's Prophecy has its own web site, where the browser can peruse pertinent information about the contents of the book and the life of the author. Lavie enjoyed a closeness to Dayan that gives him a rare insight into Dayan's role in major historical events. (He wrote a biography of Dayan, that appeared in 1969, in the aftermath of the Six Day War.) Dayan's efforts, in the pre-Yom Kippur War period, to reach an agreement with Sadat, involving an Israeli withdrawal from the banks of the Suez Canal to positions in Sinai, with the quid pro quo of an accord on non-belligerency, stand out in the tragic perspective of later developments. This was an opportunity to avoid the trauma of the 1973 war that was missed in large measure because of the myopia of Israel's political leadership. Lavie adds important details that place in a more favorable light the darkest period of Dayan's career, the mishap that marked the early days of the Yom Kippur War. As Lavie describes the flow of events, Dayan, unlike IDF Intelligence and the chief of staff, "viewed the intelligence reports of Egyptian preparations for war with gravity." The political stalemate, after the rejection of Dayan's conciliatory proposals by Golda Meir and by his cabinet colleagues, and after the failure, in April, 1973, of talks in Washington with the Egyptian envoy, Hafez Ismail, "sent a clear danger signal to Dayan. He promptly initiated several large-scale conferences with the officers of the IDF's three regional commands, in which he spoke about the political situation and his evaluation of the Arab states and that we must now prepare for war."

To provide additional proof of Dayan's clairvoyance, Lavie tells of a highly secret meeting between Golda Meir and King Hussein, just before Rosh Hashana. "During that conversation at a VIP guesthouse near Tel Aviv, the king stated that the Syrian army was deployed for war." At a meeting of the General Staff that Dayan convened on the eve of Rosh Hashana, chief of staff David Elazar and the intelligence chief, Eli Zeira, discounted the king's message. On the morning of the Yom Kippur War, Dayan held a last-minute conference with Elazar and Zeira. News of the hurried evacuation of the families of Soviet advisers in the Syrian and Egyptian armies had been received, as well as Air Force reconnaissance photos of "an unprecedented deployment of the Egyptian army along the Suez Canal, which could only be explained as actions preliminary to war." Dayan told the army chiefs, "You are not taking the Egyptians and Syrians seriously. I take them very seriously." Elazar and Zeira remained unconvinced. Lavie admits that he himself "did not share Dayan's anxiety and alarm that war was on our doorstep... trying with the hope that it was only Dayan's natural pessimism that had led him to his exaggerated, gloomy forecast."

But if Dayan's forecast was, indeed, so accurate, why the tragic unpreparedness, and what was the measure of Dayan's responsibility? On these questions, there are no clear answers. True, professional military estimates were the responsibility of the military professionals, and Dayan, as defense minister, despite his background and achievements, functioned in that role as a political non-professional. However, Dayan's responsibility does not end there. He arguably could not interfere with Elazar and Zeira's professional judgments; but, if he lacked confidence in them, it was his duty — not just his prerogative — to replace them. The ultimate responsibility, in his ministerial role, was Dayan's. This is the issue that the post-war Agranat Commission did not examine. Its failure to do so was largely misunderstood. Justice Agranat later sought to make clear that the political process whereby the House of Representatives indicted for "high crimes and misdemeanors" (The Senate then "tries" the person under impeachment and can remove him or her by no less than a two-thirds vote.)

"Do you think President Clinton is going to be impeached?" Gingrich was asked.

"If you asked me that question six or nine months ago, I would have laughed at you," Gingrich said. "But I'm not laughing now."

Despite the fact that Gingrich is certainly a partisan source on power plays inside the Beltway, he is undoubtedly an authoritative source on thinking inside Washington and especially the Republican Party.

Readers will be spared the rest of the eight-minute conversation that touched on the details of the various investigations into the affairs — business, political and sexual — of Bill Clinton, his wife Hillary and their associates. Suffice it to say that Clinton's biggest problems have nothing to do with his various sexual adventures or even with the Whitewater real estate fraud scandal from his time as governor of Arkansas. Rather, congressional investigators and the Special Independent Federal Prosecutor are looking at suspected abuses of power and influence-peddling that dwarf the offenses of Nixon (and the trumped-up charges against Johnson). Nixon's Watergate scandal was relatively uncomplicated: Republicans broke into the Democratic headquarters and got caught, while Nixon and his men tried to cover up the various dirty tricks with even more tricks that were progressively dirtier. The problem with following the threads of Clinton's scandals — Travelgate (firing the White House travel office personnel), Koreagate (illegal donations and influence peddling with Koreans), Flaggate (examining the FBI files of political opponents), Teamster-gate (suspected involvement in manipulation of the Teamsters' union), Indonesia-gate, China-gate, Sudan-gate, and others — is that they are so complicated that you almost have to be a Washington lawyer or a certified accountant to understand what the whole fuss is about.

At this point the reader might well throw his hands up and say please spare me all these charges and investigations. In fact, the authors do just that. Tyrrell does not repeat the two mistakes he made in his book Boy Clinton. There he overwhelmed the reader with a microscopic portrait of every Clinton wart and pimple,

ISRAEL SUN

THE IMPEACHMENT OF WILLIAM JEFFERSON CLINTON by R. Emmett Tyrrell, Jr. and "Anonymous." Washington, D.C., Regnery. 275 pp. Price not stated.

By Michael Widlanski

The indictment and trial of an incumbent president — whether it is Richard Nixon, Andrew Johnson (Abraham Lincoln's successor) or Bill Clinton — is a subject that is difficult in both political and historical terms. This book does a surprisingly good job of covering all the angles, despite the deep animosity of the authors towards Bill Clinton. But first, a brief digression.

Immediately after reading this book, I encountered the man who may have the most to say about a possible impeachment of President Clinton — Congressman Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), the Speaker of the House of Representatives and perhaps the most powerful Republican in Washington. Representative Gingrich was at an official dinner with Prime Minister Netanyahu at the King David Hotel, and it was a good opportunity to ask him if he thought Clinton was going to face impeachment — the political process whereby the House of Representatives basically "indicts" for "high crimes and misdemeanors." (The Senate then "tries" the person under impeachment and can remove him or her by no less than a two-thirds vote.)

"Do you think President Clinton is going to be impeached?" Gingrich was asked.

"If you asked me that question six or nine months ago, I would have laughed at you," Gingrich said. "But I'm not laughing now."

Despite the fact that Gingrich is certainly a partisan source on power plays inside the Beltway, he is undoubtedly an authoritative source on thinking inside Washington and especially the Republican Party.

At this point the reader might well throw his hands up and say please spare me all these charges and investigations. In fact, the authors do just that. Tyrrell does not repeat the two mistakes he made in his book Boy Clinton. There he overwhelmed the reader with a microscopic portrait of every Clinton wart and pimple, while at the same time flaunting his own anti-Clinton feelings. Here, fortunately, Tyrrell (writing with an anonymous author believed to be a Republican-appointed judge, according to the New Yorker) does not bury us in facts. He also gives his prejudices a rest.

Going for Clinton

What emerges is a fascinating two-part book that mixes facts and conjecture. The first part is a thumbnail sketch of Clinton's suspected transgressions since coming to the White House, minus the sexual stuff with Monica Lewinsky et al., and without the Whitewater scandal from Clinton's years as governor. The reader is then taken to the beginning of impeachment hearings in the House Judiciary Committee at some point in the future.

Because the book was finished in September 1997, there is no mention of the newly emerging scandal reported by Jeff Gerth in the New York Times of an illegal $80,000 contribution from the Chinese Army's chief of staff to the Clinton election campaign. Nor is there any mention of the subsequent New York Times finding that the Clinton administration then approved the export of sensitive missile and satellite technology to China. Less than a week after these stories broke, the Associated Press published an analysis stating that even congressional Democrats were beginning to desert the Clinton camp and could not be counted on to be automatic supporters.

The second half of the book is about the conjectured impeachment and trial of Clinton. The outcome hinges on whether Democrats in the Senate break ranks with the attractive president from their own party and join the Republican accusers. In this part in particular the writing is crisp, full of telling personal portraits of congressmen, congresswomen and senators. It reads like good political fiction, but with a difference: tomorrow it could be true.

BOOK BYTES

Beryl Bainbridge, author of the titanic novel Every Man for Himself (Carroll & Graf), viewed James Cameron's Oscar-winning film Titanic from her unique and highly critical vantage point. "The film shows the lovers running down E deck into the engine room. Ludicrous. The corridor [to the engine room] would have melted." Researching her book, Bainbridge "read and read, and read" contemporary reports and survivors' accounts. The girlish looking 63-year-old author encouraged her grandson to build her a model of the ill-fated ship. She studied photographs, visited museums to see ships' engines and watched the 1953 film, starring Barbara Stanwyck. After two months of ransacking the historical sources, she told her publisher, "I'm halfway through," and only then did she start the punishing task of writing her book.

She writes day and night, beginning at six in the morning, and goes through to the small hours. While completing the last six pages of Every Man at 4 a.m. on the morning of April 12, 1996 — the liner sank on that day 84 years earlier — she heard voices coming from the kitchen downstairs. At first she thought it was the radio, but then she realized that the voices were coming from inside her head. "It was the drowned having chats," she maintained.

AS PART OF the Israel-British Week in May, the British Council in Jerusalem held an evening of readings and discussion with two up-and-coming novelists, Gwyneth Jones and Chaz Brechley. Jones characterized her university education as a study of "the philosophy of science," a course she followed in order to avoid studying English literature. "I didn't want to analyze novels, because I preferred to read and enjoy them." She described her brand of science fiction as "scientifically rigorous." Her later novels, including North Wind (Tor), from which she read, are built around reimagining Aleutians, a group of aliens who "accidentally invaded" planet Earth. Both in her reading and discussion, Jones described her Aleutians as if they were already here.

For a Brit, Chaz Brechley cuts a rather American-looking figure with his shadow of a beard, baseball cap and floppy red T-shirt. His eighth book, Dispossession, featuring a fallen angel, Brechley, who is currently switching genres from crime mysteries to historical fantasy, took the daring step of reading from the manuscript pages of his work-in-progress set during the First Crusade. He said he's been waiting 20 years for an "original idea," because most of the fantasy written today is "bad Tolkien." To break the slavishly followed precedents mapped out by The Lord of the Rings, he revealed that his series will be four books instead of three and the storyline will not follow the usual quest pattern.

Both authors described their work day. Jones works on a computer when her child is at school; when he comes home she stops writing.

Brechley said he's "anything but disciplined." When he's writing, it's day and night for periods of four to six weeks, in which time he can turn out "a significant chunk of prose."

HARD COVER, soft cover, and now, if you're hooked up to the Internet, there's no cover. The first chapter of John Grisham's latest block-buster The Street Lawyer has now been uncovered on the web at <http://www.jgrisham.com>. The book came out earlier this year in the US.

Lethal lackadaisical attitudes

The tragic litany is long and growing. A roof in a Beersheba gymnasium collapses last week, killing two pupils. A bridge carrying athletes to the opening ceremony of the Maccabiah games last year buckles, leading to four deaths and many serious injuries. Poor planning at the Arad Festival three years ago costs the lives of three teenagers crushed to death, as fences meant to hold back crowds give way. A scaffolding under the Shapirum interchange being built on the Tel Aviv-Jerusalem highway collapses four years ago on top of an automobile, killing three. And two days ago nine-year-old Amelia Cohen falls from the window of her school in Jerusalem after a protective railing was removed. She is in critical condition after sustaining severe head injuries.

The common elements in all of these tragedies are disturbing and point to flaws in basic attitudes and actions in this country that lead to loss of lives. They include rules that are disregarded and bent, corners that are cut, costs saved by ignoring safety devices, a taking of responsibility that is evaded, and letting those responsible escape paying a price for their negligence due to a lack of resolve. Commissions of inquiry study the accidents and publish findings that are routinely ignored. Taken together, there should be an urgent wake-up call here to educators, legislators, law-enforcement officers, professional organizations, supervising agencies, and shapers of public attitudes. This cannot go on — the toll in lives is too heavy to bear.

Israelis are proud of a penchant for finding clever, improvised solutions to problems that exhibit thinking beyond the limitations of textbook conventions. This trait is often fed by legendary stories drawn from the annals of the IDF, of small bands of commanders and soldiers doing the seemingly impossible by daring to ignore conventional thinking. The emphasis is placed on attaining the ends, regardless of what others say or think. But when this becomes related to a lackadaisical attitude toward rules and laws, which represent constricting thinking standing in the way of attaining a particular goal, it too often becomes dangerous. This sometimes-admired disregard for rules many times leads to training accidents, tragic traffic violations, and cutting corners on safety regulations in construction work simply to save money.

This type of behavior has been exhibited in a number of recent tragedies. An IDF offer to build a bridge strong enough to bear tank traffic for the opening ceremonies of the Maccabiah games last summer was rejected by the organizers of the game, because the bidding price was too high. The bridge that was eventually built cost much less, but also had a much lower load-bearing capacity. There have been similar charges that window bars in the Luria Elementary School in Jerusalem, which might have prevented Amelia Cohen's fall, were not installed due to budgetary problems. There needs to be a clear statement that under no circumstances can budget savings come at the expense of safety. Any amount of monetary saving pales in comparison with the price paid in lives and debilitating injuries.

In virtually every tragic accident that has recently occurred in Israel, the first reaction of individuals in positions of responsibility has been to attempt to evade blame. Indeed, the fact that the law requires numerous supervising bodies to ascertain that safety regulations are being followed — itself a device meant to prevent accidents by ensuring that a number of different persons review precautions being taken — has often been twisted into a tool for evading responsibility. Contractors blame engineers, who in turn blame architects and designers, and attorneys for defendants in negligence cases ask why the fire services and police are not prosecuted instead of their clients. The sight of a public official resigning following a tragedy is almost unheard of in this country.

Instead, the favored response is to establish commissions of inquiry, preferably multiple commissions. Last week's gym roof collapse in Beersheba, for example, is being investigated by three separate bodies: the Israel Police, the Ministry of Education, and the Labor and Social Affairs Ministry. Too often, the effect of these inquiries is to further muddy clear lines of responsibility and to create more reports and rules that are subsequently ignored.

Nor do our law-enforcement officials take the sort of swift action that would send a clear message to those entrusted with safety inspections that negligence will not be tolerated in this society. It took nearly five months after the Maccabiah bridge tragedy for the State Attorney's Office to issue indictments — and this was seen as an example of quick work on the part of the state attorney. The Shapirum bridge collapse, although it occurred four years ago, seems to have gotten lost in the files of the prosecutors.

One of the factors that has always made Israel an attractive place to live was the emphasis placed on the value of each and every individual life, reflecting a traditional Jewish sanctification of the act of saving, protecting, and preserving life. The recurrence of tragic accidents — along with the marked increase in violent crime — have begun indicating a shaking of that once bedrock assumption. Negligence in enforcing safety laws and regulations indicates a weakening in concern for the lives of others. It is time to ensure that this concern once again becomes and remains a central value.

Bring Raviv to trial

NO sooner was Margalit Har-Shefi convicted of not having taken reasonable measures to prevent the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, then the predictable, Pavlovian knee-jerk reaction came from the far-left wolves scenting blood.

Leading the pack was Leah Rabin, who was reported to have declared that both Yigal Amir and Har-Shefi were but instruments in the hands of "inciters," who stood on a balcony and smiled while in the street below a vicious campaign of instigation was conducted against her husband.

Out tumbled copy-cat provocative comments, aimed at smearing both the religious and secular national camp: "The assassin was not alone...an evil spirit still stalks the land."

The barely concealed implication of the Left is that Binyamin Netanyahu and the other right-wing balcony speakers at a mass meeting in Jerusalem were responsible for Rabin's assassination. Not a shred of proof has ever been produced to prove this blatant falsehood.

But there were inciters at work. Inciters whose activities were authorized by Carmi Gillon, head of the General Security Services and his boss, then-premier Rabin, along with the blessings of the leading judicial officers of the Labor-controlled administration. What really happened at that mass protest against the way the Oslo Accords were being steamrolled through the Knesset? We were there and did not hear a single speaker preach violence or treason.

Yet there was incitement. It was provided by GSS agent Avishai Raviv. He gathered up a dozen or so banners carried by young teenagers, bearing photo-montage pictures of Rabin dressed up as an SS general. He handed them over to the compliant TV crews and pressed them hard to run them that very night — which they promptly did.

These particular youngsters had attended a summer youth camp run by Raviv, a macho figure whom they worshipped. Raviv was a brilliant success as an undercover agent. GSS handlers guided and instructed him how to infiltrate the world of students and then incite them to carry out deeds which would prove that there was a right-wing conspiracy to topple the government, when in fact none existed.

URI DAN

Raviv also created his own phony group and took it to demonstrate in front of Rabin's home on Friday afternoons to chant: "Rabin and his wife will be hung like Mussolini and his mistress."

In another incident, Raviv was given wide media coverage when he claimed his Eyal youth movement had murdered an Arab near Hebron in revenge for the deaths of Jews in suicide attacks. Wide criticism, verging on hysteria, was heaped on Hebron settlers. Ten days later it was found that a gang of Arab thieves were guilty of the killing.

Evidence was brought to the Shamgar inquiry by young girls who were present at a settlement meeting where Raviv urged Yigal Amir to prove his worth as a man and kill Rabin. As we detailed in our book published in France, A State Crime, Raviv carried out other similar activities. Because both Gillon and Rabin knew full well just how illegal these actions were, they asked for and received full judicial backing by then-attorney-general Michael Ben-Yair and other top legal officials.

EVIDENCE of how the GSS employed Raviv and other inciters was given in closed sessions to the Shamgar Commission. But why was it done behind closed doors and its evidence never revealed to the public? After all, its function was to unravel the truth.

For one, the GSS opposed such a move. It claimed great harm would be done to its work if its operational methods were brought to the public's attention. Another excuse was given by Ben-Yair and his successor, Elyakim Rubinstein, as well as State Attorney Edna Arbel. They argued they did not have sufficient evidence to bring the matter to court.

That sounded like a very lame excuse. Doing their duty, as they must when they feel the law has been broken, the judicial authorities did not hesitate for a moment recently when they brought a handful of mayors to court on charges of corruption and financial impropriety. In virtually every case, the men in the dock were acquitted.

How strange therefore, that when evidence arises that a government deliberately set out to politicize the vital secret service of the country, the legal authorities saw nothing, heard nothing and did not even smell anything amiss. And by so doing, they failed to fulfill their role as guardians of the law.

Perhaps blushing a little over how a minor player like Har-Shefi gets the full treatment in court, while Raviv wanders around a free man, the state attorney said she will make a decision about Raviv's file within a few weeks. Truly, the wheels of justice, when it comes to politics, grind exceedingly slow. Let us see if this is merely a sop to silence their critics — or whether it really will happen.

The only glimmer of light in this murky world is Gillon's replacement, Ami Ayalon. He made it a priority when he came into the job to clean out the stables of the secret service.

Ayalon has informed Rubinstein that the GSS no longer objects to Raviv being tried. The state attorneys may agonize. But let them remember that there is a powerful element in the human psyche which calls for natural justice.

If a minor cog in the Rabin affair faces a prison term then surely the inciter-in-chief, and those who employed and trained Raviv should also be punished for their wickedness.

PLC asserts itself

THE Palestinian Legislative Council had an interesting debate on Monday. Responding to a call for a vote of confidence in the Palestinian National Authority government, the 88-member council debated whether to vote the confidence issue or to accept the request by President Arafat for a 10-day reprieve.

Speaker of the Council, Ahmed Qurei (Abu Ala), presented the legislature with a letter asking for a 10-day delay. Another letter, approved by the secretary of the PLO's executive committee, Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), also included a similar commitment. A heated two-hour debate ensued, which was animated by the use of World Cup terminology to reflect a variety of opinions within the legislature.

In the end, agreement was reached to postpone the confidence session until a week from today. But there is no doubt that for the first time in modern Palestinian history — some would say even modern Arab history — parliamentarians have succeeded in shaking up the tranquility and stability traditionally enjoyed by the executive branch.

One year ago, the Palestinian Legislative Council was suffering from oblivion and general media obscurity. The Palestinian Broadcasting Corporation was making no mention of the PLC or its sessions and the national Palestinian press was giving very little coverage to its deliberations.

But the discussion of the national budget proved to be a catalyst. For months before the debate, PLC members had demanded to have the right to review, discuss and finally approve the national budget.

For 30 years, during the full Israeli occupation, the Palestinian public was not allowed to know how their taxes were being spent. Now that a Palestinian national authority was in charge, they wanted to know where every dollar was going.

The Fatah-dominated council had reached an agreement with Arafat. The deal called for the finance minister to submit, for the first time, a budget. In return, the parliamentarians promised the leader of their party they would approve the budget.

BUT as is often the case, the process didn't turn out as planned. The budget's publication allowed for criticism as to how the taxpayers' money was being spent. A heated session on May 20 included direct accusations against the PNA for allowing ministers to spend way beyond what is acceptable.

Worst of all was the attack against the monopolies that had been established with the support of, and sometimes in partnership with, the PNA. This debate, which was aired live on a local television station in Ramallah and distributed to many other stations, caused much unease among many senior officials, and the director of the TV station was detained.

When the discussion continued in the public sphere, the PNA released its own report about corruption. The publication of this internal report aimed at stopping the criticism, but instead it simply confirmed and legitimized the debate.

The entire discussion and its various reactions raised the profile of the Palestinian Legislative Council, increased press coverage and made the council members much angrier. Since then, a consistent demand for change has been the most repeated request made by the legislators.

While it has taken a year for the executive branch of the Palestinian National Authority to act, there is no doubt that its persistence and the genuine threat (especially by the supporters of Arafat's own Fatah faction) to place a vote of no confidence in the government, has brought results.

In Monday's debate, the issue of a change in the government was no longer demanded. More than one legislator said, using terminology borrowed from the soccer field, we are not interested in a personal substitution.

They demanded real reform rather than a mere change in personnel. No one wants one corrupt minister replaced by another who, in a short space of time, will also be corrupted.

While it is unlikely that real reform will take place overnight, the mere fact that a small group of independent legislators were able to force the Palestinian government to respond to their demands for reform is commendable.

And although the national struggle has and will continue to take precedence over internal issues, the future of Palestine will depend as much on the success in the negotiations for Palestinian lands as on the building of a civil society that respects the freedoms and rights of its citizens.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

YASSIN'S RETURN

Sir — The latest Israeli controversy revolves around Sheikh Ahmed Yassin: should he be allowed to return to the territories or should he be prevented from doing so?

But of all the arguments given for and against his return, I have yet to hear a debate based upon the principle that Israel cannot allow the avowed, unrepentant head of a terrorist organization, find sanctuary in its midst.

What has happened to principle? Is idealism no longer worthy of discussion? Is shameless pragmatism the only tool left? Has living in the real world caused us to lose sight of our heritage? And can we hold the world to a higher standard if we fail to meet the challenge?

We are all united in the belief that Israel was meant to show the world how justice can be achieved. It saddens me to say that we cannot fulfill our destiny of being a "light unto the nations" as we shamelessly ignore basic universal principles we once held dear.

BELIEF IN THE MESSIAH

Sir, The shocking op-ed piece by David Newman, "False messiahs" (June 17), should not go unanswered.

He makes the mistake (among others) of misreading the attitudes of a small fringe as though they represented Habad, and they do not.

Mashi'ah and hassidism have been synonymous since the time of the Baal Shem Tov. The opposition to the hassidic movement was precisely because they stirred the mind to think of mashi'ah in a tangible way, and this scared the minagdim. Every Jew is halachically required to subscribe to the belief that the messiah will come!

IRA L. JACOBSON

Petah Tikva.

FALSE ASSERTION

Sir — David Newman's assertion, in "False messiahs" (June 17), that the messianism displayed by members of Habad "far more removed and distant from any theological interpretation of Judaism than those expressed by the Reform and Conservative" movements is absurd.

Whereas most Orthodox Jews certainly disagree with messianic claims regarding Rabbi Schneerson and vehemently oppose related, deviant practices of the Habad fringe element, no knowledgeable Jew will challenge Habad's basic theology as "a basic departure from the essential theological foundations of Judaism."

These, as outlined in Maimonides' 13 principles, include belief in the God-given, immutable Torah, divine reward and punishment, the eventual coming of the (true) messiah and resurrection of the dead. The Reform and Conservative movements do not share these beliefs.

Yes, we are very concerned about possible Christian/Sabbatean-like repercussions from belief in a false messiah, but we are even more afraid of the repercussions of validating the false theologies of the Reform and the Conservatives.

Bigger is always better

A comet on a collision course with Earth causes panic on the streets in 'Deep Impact' (above) and also in the forthcoming 'Armageddon.'

Too many movies 'present spectacle at the expense of depth'

By JOHN HORN

Is bigger necessarily better? The 1998 summer movie season is overflowing with pyrotechnics, wild special effects and end-of-the-world scenarios.

The Walt Disney Co. has made its most expensive movie ever, a 500-foot-tall (150-meter) Godzilla will invade New York and one of Hollywood's top directors (Steven Spielberg) is collaborating with one of the world's top stars (Tom Hanks).

For all the flash and sizzle, the makers of these spectacles also realize explosions can no longer supplant emotions.

Hundreds of millions of teenagers didn't go see Titanic just to watch a big boat sink. They went to witness melodramatic passion, to have a cry with Leo and Kate.

"The new wave and continuing wave of summer event films requires more than just a visual spectacle," says Rob Fried, one of the executive producers of Godzilla, released in the US on May 20.

"Godzilla is an emotional movie. I swear to you, it is. [The filmmakers] created a film with a soul. And I don't think people expect that," he says.

This summer's movies were written and developed well before Titanic debuted to its spectacular returns. That doesn't mean the film's lessons are lost on Hollywood. Not too long ago, the goal of many studios was to throw as many fireworks onto the screen as would fit. The Lost World: Jurassic Park and Speed 2: Cruise Control weren't made because they improved on their predecessors' stories or hit some new emotional truth.

They simply made more noise.

"We're still sucked in by the capacity of film to dazzle in a way it never could before," says Bruce Joel Rubin, the co-screenwriter of Deep Impact, currently showing in Israeli cinemas. "But the audience is starting to say, 'We've seen that. They want to experience another person's life without living it.'"

"The best thing a movie can do is present spectacle and depth at the same time. But a lot of movies present spectacle at the expense of depth. And spectacle is so much easier to achieve." The new crop of summer movies seeks to use technology in the service of story. And some of them are actually rather smart for the popcorn season.

"I think the audience is definitely smarter than we give them credit for," says Andrew Niccol, the writer of The Truman Show, starring Jim Carrey as a man unwittingly caught in a 24-hour-a-day television show about his life.

Unlike many Hollywood films, Niccol and director Peter Weir don't stop to explain the film's plot; its show-within-a-show conceit isn't revealed until The Truman Show is nearly halfway over.

The problem is we are so used to following the bouncing ball that for the first 30 minutes you don't know what's going on, which is very unusual," Niccol says.

In place of Carrey's typical crass humor, The Truman Show is far darker, a meditation on the media and society. Early test audiences, Niccol says, "certainly weren't expecting it. They were not expecting anything other than a Jim Carrey film, so they expected an out-and-out comedy, which this obviously isn't." All the same, he says, only a few were confused by the change of pace. The Truman Show debuted in the US on June 5.

"You can't keep making the same action movies over and over again," says Mimi Leder, the director of the comet drama Deep Impact, which stars Tea Leoni, Robert Duvall and Morgan Freeman. "We have to infuse some heart in these stories because they're getting really dusty." Most of the many revisions on the script for Armageddon, the summer's second asteroid drama, were focused on developing the film's love story and personal relationships. The film, Disney's costliest ever, opens in the US July 1. It stars Bruce Willis, Ben Affleck and Billy Bob Thornton.

"We kept working and working on these characters to make them live and breathe," says Jerry Bruckheimer, the film's producer. Willis, the producer says, was initially hesitant to commit to the project because the script wasn't quite right yet, and didn't have adequate plot development.

Both Deep Impact and Armageddon are set in the days before an enormous comet is set to collide with Earth. Deep Impact focuses more closely on how such a threat affects people on Earth—how does the world respond to a collective annihilation?

Armageddon pays more attention to the ragtag band of astronauts sent into space to blow up the asteroid—will they be heroes and save the world or die trying?

"One of the things I was most interested in was how do you say goodbye to the ones you love," says Leder. Even though the plot of Deep Impact is driven by an outer-space asteroid, "I was really trying to get it back to a story about people on Earth," she says.

Without emotional connections, Bruckheimer says, the audience is a passive spectator in the film. "You have to get them invested in the characters," he says. "We're in the transportation business. We want to take you to another place. We want you to be on that asteroid with them."

Armageddon, said to cost more than $100 million, features a whopping 250 special-effects shots. "But this is not an asteroid movie," says director Michael Bay. "Some of the best scenes in the movie are the small scenes. The effects don't mean anything ultimately. They're cool and they're exciting, but you have to feel something afterward."

For Spielberg and Hanks' Saving Private Ryan, a World War II drama opening in the US on July 24, DreamWorks sought to create a world that would be impossible to visit otherwise. Instead of an asteroid or a giant lizard, its world is a body-strewn battlefield.

"As the use of digital technology has evolved over the last five years, we might have gone from a time where special effects were considered an end in themselves to a time when they are just one of the tools used to tell a story," says Walter Parkes, of DreamWorks' motion picture division.

"But if there's a trend back toward storytelling, it can't be a bad thing." (AP)

Zoom into the party zone

By RUTH MARKS

Through the sea of pumping beats and the maze of nightclubs that fill Tel Aviv's old port, it is not difficult to find Zoom, one of the city's newest night spots.

Leaving behind the smell of al ha'ish restaurants that sit on the northern end of Dizengoff street, you enter the party zone. The first few nightclubs that greet you seem to be popular among pre-army age youngsters. The beat of their middle-of-the-road pop drifts into the night air, rising above their youthful chatter.

Zoom is further inside the old port, its bright pink and purple neon sign shining down on the crowd of party goers desperately trying to enter. It boasts a 25-plus age requirement and, as is typical with many local nightclubs, the bouncers have strict instructions to allow only people with the right image to enter.

The modernity of the club is striking. The ceiling is high with a balcony overlooking the dance floor for those who simply like to watch others dance. The place stretches right up to the water's edge, with the pleasant sea breeze cooling off the outside dance floor.

A large bar is slap bang in the center of this huge one-time warehouse, offering a wide selection of beers, wines and spirits. There is no pushing and shoving at this bar, as there is room enough for everyone to comfortably order their drinks.

Inside, large, old-fashioned sofas and long, bench-like beds line the walls. But outside is where it all happens. Three enormous speakers are spaced across the dance floor, and the DJ plays song after song of contemporary pop and Eurotrash to get the crowd moving.

By 2 a.m. the place is buzzing, filled with Tel Aviv's trendy twenty-somethings.

The night we were there, Israel's current songwriter hero Zvika Piki (who penned "Diva," Dana International's winning Eurovision Song Contest hit) was sitting in the club, surrounded by a group of sexy Israeli women with bodies that Dana International would kill for.

A year ago, Zoom was just an open-air disco recently new compared to its neighboring nightclub Octopus. Less than eight months ago, based on last summer's success, the owners decided to upgrade the club and built the modern inside section.

Zoom is open Fridays (and some Thursdays) from midnight until 6 a.m. During the week the club can be rented for private functions and parties.

As we leave at 3:30 a.m., the whole port is alive and buzzing with activity. Crowds of people are still attempting to push their way past the bouncers to pay the NIS 50 entrance fee and dance until the sun comes up. Others are content to dance in the street, as the music can be heard all around.

When we get back to Dizengoff, the restaurants and cafes are packed with young people standing around chatting and laughing as if this Friday night would never end.

Music on my mind

Basketball legend Aulcie Perry talks about his favorite singers

Aulcie Perry draws a crowd at every turn. Although he was away from Israel for 10 years and only returned in 1996, his fame here has grown.

He of the once-formidable sports talent and unmistakable, imposing presence (2.10 meters) cannot step out in public without being swamped by fans eager for a handshake, which is always graciously supplied by Aulcie Perry.

A star basketball player with Maccabi Tel Aviv from 1976 to 1985, Perry fell from grace after being arrested and serving time on drug charges in the US.

Perry—who underwent an Orthodox conversion in 1978—was rescued by a group of Israelis who offered him a ticket home and a partnership in a burger franchise. As the manager of a Burger Ranch in Tel Aviv, he's been shaking his head in gratitude and wonder ever since.

His beginner's level Hebrew sees him through talk shows, where he's asked his opinion on everything from the jubilee to jazz. Here he speaks about the lyrics and performance styles of the musical artists he listens to when he's far from the maddening Israeli crowd.

gar, he took the beat and the rap and did a crossover into gospel and made it pop. You can't listen to it and say, 'This is gospel.' You can relate Franklin's music to God or to the life force itself. His music should be classified under a new musical category: Very Special."

4. Shlomo Artzi
"He's the male artist of Israel, a very unique voice: raspy, but with a lot of range. The first time I heard him, my Hebrew still wasn't the best so I couldn't understand the lyrics that well. It was the music and the arrangements that first captured me. What really got me is when I started to go to his concerts (by then I could understand the lyrics); his showmanship on stage. I heard him live at the Mann Auditorium. I could feel how he touched the audience. It was very special to experience. There's also the confidence he has in himself. A musician has to have a lot of confidence. He also creates an entire ensemble; all the musicians (on stage) display their talents. Often the key musician is the show. Artzi gives them all a chance to shine. I liken it to being a creative success, be it on the stage, the recording studio, on the court, or in business. It's a team effort."

5. Rita
"I've saved the best for last. Pow! That voice hits you. And her performance...it's unbelievable. You have a total package in her: excellent singers, excellent dancers, excellent choreography—complements her performance. She gives you everything. She's created a classic, classy act. She's not just a singer; she's a tremendous artist. Rita's voice, personality and persona fill a big space."

Tel Aviv

Pop steals the scene this weekend, with heavy hitters playing all around town. Start off by emptying your pockets for a good cause: Yehuda Poliker, armed with a snazzy new single in anticipation of his next album, plays a benefit concert tonight. The proceeds will help establish a new mental health center. Tickets (gulp) are NIS 200-300. The Tel Aviv Performing Arts Center at 8:30 p.m. Call (03) 640-8055.

Saturday night completes the picture with the gentle and lyrical Etti Ankri playing a concert to show off her latest album, Nonetheless and Regardless. With her sultry voice, intercultural music, and the accompaniment of the ubiquitous Rafi Kadishson, this will be one of the more pleasant Saturday night summer activities. It takes place at the elegant Enav Cultural Center on the roof of Gan Ha'ir, overlooking Kikar Rabin. Starts at 9:30 p.m.

But don't wait until Saturday night to get to Enav. Tonight, the center wins the originality award hands down with "Batikvot" (The Hopes), a collection of video works from the creative to the experimental. The presentations are the work of young artists who believe that video is the future. Starts at 9 p.m. Call (03) 521-7763 for details.

Looking for a subversive activity instead of the traditional Friday night? Sabotage Baby says it all, and is perhaps Batsheva's most outrageous extravaganza to date. The costumes and lighting are wild enough, not to mention the dancing. Witness the event at the cavernous Cinemas, down on Petah Tikva road, for the last performances of the season. Call 03-527-9797.

A fascinating scene will take hold of Tel Aviv next week, starting on Friday night (see "And Points Beyond"). Israel's version of Gay Pride Week is beautifully organized and has gathered an impressive crowd in its honor, for an event on Sunday night. This will be an evening of skits, songs and performances called "From Tzavta with Pride," at the Tzavta. The VIP guest list features Merav Michaeli, as well as Assaf Amdorsky, Orly Banai, and Sivan Shavit. 8:30 p.m. (03) 620-4327 (03) 6201977

Jerusalem

A brand-new play is at the Khan tonight, entitled Conversations after a Funeral. This is an extended family story revolving around the funeral of the father. Starts at 8:30 at the Khan, near the train station.

Even on a Friday afternoon, Jerusalem has funk in its soul! Alternativa features Jean-Claude Jones on double bass, Assaf Sirkis on drums, etc. This is a perfect time to soak up sun and free style music at Habama, 4 Yad Harutzim. Starts at 2:30 p.m., Call (02) 671-3814.

And in case audiences have difficulty relinquishing this pleasant Jerusalem music scene at the end of the weekend, Saturday night jazz is the coolest way to swing into the week. At the Bible Lands Museum, 25 Granot Street, as part of its Summer Jazz series, Leonid Petashkon and Ara'le Kaminsky perform tonight in a show called From East to West. (02) 561-1066

Hard-core ethnic music fans, however, should head to the Confederation House, where Ensemble Demm plays on Saturday night. The in-house band plays music of Dagestani immigrants, which is a mixture of Persian, Turkish and Azerbaijani music, with a few Dagestani and Chechyan tunes thrown in. Don't even try to imagine it, just go. With Zarbi Maqam. Starting at 9 p.m., 12 Emil Botta.

Beir Agnon is holding the last talk in its The Late Agnon series tonight. The lecture is entitled "Korot Bateinu," given by Dr. Ariel Hirschfeld. 16 Klausner

Yehuda Poliker plays a benefit concert at The Tel Aviv Performing Arts Center, tonight at 8:30. (Michal Heimann)

Street, 8 p.m. (02) 671-6498.

And Points Beyond

There will be an enormous bash in Haifa for a grand kick-off of Gay Pride week. The party starts at 11 p.m. on the Haifa Port, at the Dyke Club. Tickets must be purchased in advance.

Haifa, in fact, is the spot for other interesting events: Barry Sakharov performs tonight at Kiryat Haim at the Zoo B Club starting at 10 p.m.

Television

Seven with Brad Pitt and Morgan Freeman offers junk-food fun and yucky blood fests. Channel 2, 10 p.m.

But if you're feeling more turned on to the real-life drama of history itself, watch The Last Days of Pompeii (1935), starting at 1:15 this afternoon on the Movie Channel.

"She's the queen of R&B and pop, although it's very difficult to characterize Whitney because her range and her professionalism are boundless. I was lucky enough to hear her perform live at the Meadowlands in New Jersey. She captures an audience without a lot of fanfare. [Many of] today's musicians need cranes—they're flying through the air, [using] lights and drama. Whitney does it all without that. She doesn't need tricks or stage business. It's just her voice which reigns supreme."

2. Joe
"Joe is a new R&B artist whose soulful ballads have pushed him to the top of the charts. What gets me about Joe are the lyrics—he's a love-song singer. I'm a very sentimental guy, and I always pay attention to the words. When you listen to Joe, you want to be at home with that someone you really care about. He connects you to real love situations, now and in the past."

The crater of civilization

The cracks and masses of stone of the still-evolving Makhtesh Ramon, the largest crater of its kind, appear ready to crash down, though in reality this will take thousands of years.

Day Tripper

By HANI SHAPIRO

There is nothing so empty, that evokes such feelings of abandon, as an observatory at night.

These were the emotions I experienced when I visited the Mitzpe Ramon Observatory recently, as part of a tour arranged by the Ramon Inn Hotel in Mitzpe Ramon.

In the center of a darkened room is the giant telescope, pointing out at the heavens. Occasionally there is a mechanical thud and a whirr, as the telescope changes position slightly on its computerized path to follow the life and death of the stars.

Anyone, imagining an eager astronomer peering through the device, could not be more wrong. The highly accurate telescope independently records its findings in a series of photographs. Although scientists often visit when they have observatory time, simply to ensure that everything is going smoothly, on the night we visited there was one lone technician reading a magazine in a room near the telescope.

There is far more romance outside the observatory, where the Milky Way forms a blanket across the sky, shining down on the darkened landscape. The clear air and the absence of lights allow for a unique view of the heavens. Even cars must drive with dimmed headlights in the area.

Makhtesh Ramon seems to hold the mystery of the skies. It is the largest makhtesh, a geological formation found only in Israel and Sinai, which is a mecca for geologists. According to our jeep driver and guide, Ben Drot, who took us up and down in and out of the makhtesh wadis, the crater was formed as a result of a crack in the earth's surface when it rose, creating what might have been a mountain. The surface stone normally forms a hard layer upon contact with air, but this crack opened it up to the erosion of the softer stone underneath.

The process is still continuing and even if you only visit Mitzpe Ramon's easily accessible promenade on the edge of the makhtesh you can see cracks and huge masses of stone which seem about to break away and crash down into crater. Geologically speaking, that is what is about to happen, but since it will apparently take thousands of years for even the most precarious of these stone masses to topple over, we needn't worry.

It is impossible to navigate much of the makhtesh without a jeep, and impossible to decipher it without the aid of an experienced guide.

That does not mean that it is impossible to see any of Makhtesh Ramon in an ordinary car. Anyone can drive south from Mitzpe Ramon on the winding route known as Ma'aleh Akramim. This is actually the beginning of a route to Eilat which offers a pleasant change for those used to going on the Arava Road.

Just as you reach the bottom of the descent, one of the most amazing geological phenomena, a series of long angular blocks of rock known as the Carpentry Shop, is easily accessible. Just a few kilometers further are the remains of an ancient Nabatean caravan station.

Without a guide it is doubtful that I would have noticed the many fossils in the walls of the wadi and on the ground, and I certainly would not have been able to find the few bits of petrified wood which remain in the area.

I would also have been unable to find the small pool known to locals as the Mitzpe Ramon Beach. This is a pool of saline water that formed as a result of the activities of one of the few industries allowed to function in the makhtesh, the Negev Ceramics Works, which was there prior to the establishment of the state. Water from a local aquifer fills the pool - an area hollowed out in the course of harvesting clay. The pool is small, but large enough for a brief swim and despite its salinity, there are a few plants growing along the banks. There are also, surprisingly enough, some small fish, which provided a mystery to local nature enthusiasts, who could not understand how the fish managed to reach this isolated body of water. One theory was that migrating birds had dropped small fish or fish eggs as they flew past. Only later did a local resident admit that he was a fishing enthusiast and had introduced the fish to the pool in the hope of being able to pursue his hobby there. We were tired and hot as our guide drove the jeep almost perpendicularly up a precipice, so that we could get a view of the entire area. At the top, I was surprised and delighted to find the Ramon Inn had set up a table with freshly squeezed orange juice and fresh strawberries. Unfortunately, this is not a service which the hotel provides for all of its guests, only special groups and VIPs. The hotel does offer comfortable accommodation in a place where none previously existed and also serves surprisingly good meals, which have been reviewed previously. What it lacks is a large hot tub or jacuzzi in which guests can unwind and relax after a strenuous day of touring.

It's in the jeans

Ralph Lauren uses it; Calvin Klein does too, and Levi's has for well over a century. In fact, there aren't too many designers who give denim a miss.

Once a heavy-duty fabric worn by miners, farmers and factory workers, denim has come fashionably into its own. Its durability is not only in the strength of its cloth but in its perennial popularity.

From various shades of blue, denim has diversified both in color and texture, though the blues continue to resurface season after season.

From jeans, dungarees and overalls, denim has worked its way through to elegant evening wear.

Highly popular this season are denim pinafores, slip dresses, and skirts.

Denim is so commonly associated with jeans that in many places, the word "denim" has been dropped and has been replaced by "jeans."

Either way, the fabric has been stone-washed, sun-bleached, printed, embroidered, appliqued and patch-worked. In fact, it has all but lost its identity.

The denim range in the Diorin Frankfurt collection, for instance, has a satin finish.

Some of the Castro denim also have a luxurious feel. The Castro Complice line, though sporty, has a kind of retro-style elegance, with fancy stitching and intricately shaped yokes.

Let's hope jeans are much more down to earth. Though the label on the jeans is of some significance, what really counts is the shape and the number of pockets.

Flair By Greer Fay Cashman

Shlomit Solomon most decidedly took pockets into account in the updated bra-strap dungarees which she designed for Café.

Wide suspender straps have been exchanged for something rather flimsy in comparison, and the traditionally square neckline now dips down.

Solomon transformed what was originally a male or unisex garment into a very female item of clothing.

Whether plain or fancy, denim is ubiquitous. You see it coming and going, and it seems to cross most social barriers.

Even in haredi circles, for instance, women wear denim skirts and jackets. And it is not inconceivable that the young women who belong to the national religious camp inspired what has become a worldwide trend.

Years ago, when they started wearing tee-shirts under denim sundresses, it had nothing to do with protecting themselves from the sun. It was simply that they wanted to wear similar clothes to those of their non-observant sisters. But for reasons of modesty, they had to cover their arms and upper torsos — and a simple little tee-shirt seemed to be the best solution.

Whether the end result was exported or whether it was coincidental that the rest of the world followed suit remains a matter of speculation. Suffice to say, it did a lot to bolster denim's appeal. Currently presenting an image of casual elgance, denim could go off in a completely different direction tomorrow. But with denim, perhaps more than with any other fabric, what goes around comes around.

So if you were thinking of throwing out or giving away your frayed and cut-off jeans — don't! They're bound to make a rebound — if not next year, then surely by the year 2000.

If you had to choose one fictitious literary character who would have played a great game of bridge, it would probably be Sherlock Holmes, whose deductive reasoning and logic would be great assets at the table. Bridge teachers George Gooden and Frank Thomas wrote and illustrated a marvelous book in 1973 entitled Sherlock Holmes, Bridge Detective (Pinnacle Books, New York City). Today's deal comes from the book.

The chapter reads like this: Holmes' opening one-notrump bid was standard, showing 16-18 highcard points. Watson's raise to three notrump was one highcard point short. However, he felt the possession of two tens plus a five-card suit justified the stretch.

The opening lead was the spade six. Before playing to the opening lead, Holmes took time out to plan his play. This simple but enforced pause before the first play had saved many a game for Holmes.

As he once told Doctor Watson: "A man without a plan isn't a bridge-player; he's a card-pusher."

Holmes could count eight sure winners and the club suit offered the possibility of one or two more. Another possibility was that Betty Castle (East) held the spade king. Were this the case, he was assured of three spade winners and an easy nine tricks just for the taking.

Holmes quickly dismissed this easy line of play from his thoughts. He knew Skurry (West) to be orthodox in his opening leads and decided the spade six was the fourth highest of a long spade suit.

By deducting six from 11 (The Rule of Eleven) Holmes calculated there were only five spade cards higher than the six outside Skurry's hand. Since all five were visible to Holmes, the missing king was not in Betty's hand but in Skurry's.

It took but a few seconds for the disciplined mind of the detective to see the best chance for bringing home his contract lay with the club suit. Were he to play off his three top clubs with both opponents following, he would have 10 assured tricks. However, Holmes viewed this thought negatively, knowing that six missing cards in the opponents' hands break 3-3 only about 36 percent of the time. In the more realistic event of a 4-2 split, an extra entry to dummy must be created.

Holmes, therefore, adopted a third line of play. He played the spade 10 from dummy and when Betty followed low, Holmes stunned the kibitzers by taking the trick with his spade ace. None of the onlookers were as astonished as Harry Skurry, whose jaw dropped a proverbial foot. Realizing that his expression was unnoticed by no one, Harry stammered: "Heavens, the man must be a card Croesus to be so casual about tricks."

Holmes, without comment, cashed his three top clubs ending in dummy. As expected, the suit failed to break favorably, a situation for which he was well-prepared. Holmes gave up a club trick to establish dummy's fifth club.

Now the queen-jack of spades had to be an entry to the dummy to cash the vital long club and fulfill the contract.

"It is true that I gave up a trick on your opening lead by playing my spade ace. But I ask you, my dear Skurry, without that vital unblocking play how could I have made the contract?"

Skurry didn't even wince. "I said you were a card Croesus, and I'll stick by my guns. But it's the way you play them, sir. As I've heard you say before, Holmes: 'It's often best to prepare for the worst.'"

Chess Mona who?

By NIGEL SHORT

A few months ago, a number of respected newspapers and periodicals carried an obituary of Mona Karff, who apparently had on several occasions won the US Women's Championship. This was interesting to me because in my 27 years of study and practice of the game, I had never come across her name.

Of course, gaping holes in my knowledge are by no means an unusual phenomenon (although there are somewhat fewer in the field of chess), so I decided to consult with higher authorities at the elite grandmaster tournament in Linares. Surely someone there would be able to enlighten me.

Well, no, actually. "Mona who?" was the most typical response.

Eventually I phoned Ken Whyld, the historian and co-author of the Oxford Companion to Chess.

"Ah yes, the American," he replied.

"She won the US (Women's) Championship several times!" I offered enthusiastically.

"It is rather like saying she was the champion of Rutland," he answered dryly.

Her best international result seems to have been fifth place in the Women's World Championship of 1939. It sounds impressive, but women's chess was fairly dire in those days. Only in recent decades have we seen an improvement in standards.

Cial Elec. pays NIS 119m. for 10.3% of Orckit

Cial Electronic Industries announced yesterday that it has purchased 10.3 percent of Orckit Communications for NIS 119 million. Cial acquired the stake by buying Orckit's shares on Nasdaq and by investing NIS 60m. in a secondary offer, by which the Tel Aviv based manufacturer of telecommunications equipment raised some $47m. on Tuesday.

Credit to foreigners rises sharply

Credit granted by the Israeli bank sector to foreign residents rose since the beginning of the year by NIS 1.6 billion to NIS 2.5b, according to figures published yesterday by the foreign currency supervision department at the Bank of Israel.

The increase is mainly attributed to a sharp increase in unlinked loans taken by foreigners which rose from NIS 200m. at the end of 1997 to NIS 1.6b. in April. Unlinked loans represent now 63% of all credit taken by foreign residents compared with 24% a year ago. The central bank said that unlike in previous years, most of the foreign investment in Israel was financed by unlinked loans. In the past foreign investors used mainly foreign currency-linked loans for their activities here.

Neeman: Students to teach toddlers computers

Finance Minister Yehoram Neeman has asked the Education Ministry to consider allowing students to teach kindergarten and school pupils computer skills, the Treasury said yesterday.

Neeman believes that such a program could alleviate a shortage of computer teachers in the education system.

"Today, most kindergartens and schools have computers in order to teach computer studies but there's a serious shortage of professional teachers," Neeman said.

Speaking at Jerusalem's Hebrew University last week, Neeman said there is no reason children should begin learning to read, write and do arithmetic at the age of six when computer technology would allow a three-year-old to do so.

The scheme would allow students to practice teaching skills while receiving credits toward their studies.

There is presently a shortage of some 10,000 high-tech engineers and computer programmers.

The problem is so acute that the electronics branch of the Manufacturers Association has asked the government to admit 2,000 Indian computer programmers. Neeman dismissed the request as absurd.

Mizrahi: Slowdown hit first-quarter profits

The economic slowdown led to lower profitability of publicly traded companies, according to a report the research department of United Mizrahi Bank published yesterday.

According to the report, first-quarter net profit fell to 4.8 percent of sales, compared with 5.4% in the equivalent period in 1996.

The bank attributes the decline mainly to high financing expenses arising from high interest rates. The report shows, however, that despite the economic slowdown, sales rose by 0.9% in the first quarter of the year.

The rise in sales stands in contrast to a 0.2% decline in the last quarter of 1997. Mizrahi economists said that despite the moderate rise in sales, industrial production rose by an annual 7% in the first quarter, compared with a rise of only 2% in the same quarter a year earlier. The increase is attributed mainly to a rise in exports.

Export-oriented sectors, such as chemistry and computers, led the rise, while sales of real estate and service companies decreased. The

Prodi: Italy to keep ENI controlling share

ROME (Reuters) - Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi said yesterday that the state would retain a controlling stake in energy giant ENI after the imminent sale of a fourth tranche of the group's shares.

"The privatization has been done in a way that gives the Treasury a means of guaranteeing ENI's activities," Prodi told the lower house of parliament.

He had been asked by hard-left Communist Refoundation economic spokesman Nerio Nesi for a guarantee that ENI would remain

Bezeq board recommends state cut holdings to 35%

By JUDY SEGAL

The government should reduce its holdings in Bezeq Israel Telecom to no more than 35 percent from the current 54%, the phone company said yesterday.

Bezeq's board of directors approved the proposal late Tuesday night, when it voted unanimously to support the privatization method proposed by the Government Companies Authority.

The board of directors was asked to vote on the privatization scheme before it goes to the ministerial committee on privatization. In the first stage, state-owned shares will be cut to 35%. The state will accomplish this through public offerings of shares or by selling bundles of shares to institutional investors either in Israel or abroad.

In the second stage, the remaining shares will be sold with the committee's permission. The authority will prepare the necessary documents for this by the middle of 1999 so it can be fully privatized, Bezeq said yesterday.

Privatization, the company said, will facilitate its ability to deal with a competitive telecommunications market. Company chairman Izzy Tapoohi said that, in effect, Bezeq no longer has a monopoly in domestic calls as the cellular phone companies have bitten into this market.

He said he was certain that "within a very short time, Bezeq will be a regular company that has to function as an advanced firm in the 21st century."

Meanwhile, Bezeq announced that it has launched a new marketing strategy in which technicians who visit homes and offices to fix phones will offer customers new products and services, such as voice mail, standing orders at the bank and new lines.

The recent advertising campaign for an additional phone line and a cordless phone was very successful, Bezeq said. Some 1,200 technicians are undergoing courses training them as salesmen.

Granit Hacarmel control to be sold for $211m.

By DAVID HARRIS

Businessmen Moshe Shenef and Eli Aran yesterday signed an agreement to purchase the controlling interest in Granit Hacarmel for $211.26 million, according to a statement from Mashav Initiating and Development, which conducted the sale.

The sale of 56 percent of the holding company or some 70 million shares puts its total value at some $375m., which is 55% higher than the company's current market value.

Shenef and Aran purchased the stake from Eneria-Future Energy and Technology, an affiliate of Mashav.

Globes last night reported that given the large sum needed to buy the shares, Shenef and Aran have begun negotiating for financial assistance with the Schneidman brothers, who control Zur-Shamir. The report said the Schneidmans have agreed to put up a $35 million guarantee out of a minimal equity amount of $80 million, demanded by the banks that are making credit available to Shenef and Aran.

In return, Shenef and Aran will sell Schneidman half the shares in Sonol Israel, which is Granit's principal asset.

Granit buys and imports raw petroleum and markets petroleum goods through Sonol. The company also owns Vulcan Batteries and sells other gases and oils through Granit Hacarmel Holding and Granite Hacarmel Properties.

Granit reported net sales of NIS 1.839 billion last year, with net income at NIS 51m., which was NIS 1.1m down on the 1996 figure.

In accordance with the agreement, the purchase sum must be paid within 14 days.

Paris takes World Cup cash prize Tadmor might declare IEC a monopoly

By GREGORY VISCUSI

PARIS (Bloomberg) - Brazil's team in the World Cup in France this month will play in Nantes and Marseille in the next 10 days. For team supporters Mario and Daisy Aguias, that won't mean seeing much of the country outside Paris.

The couple from Sao Paulo is doing what many soccer fans will be doing for the six-week-long tournament: staying in Paris and using France's excellent network of trains and highways to travel to games just for a day.

That means the half-million foreign fans expected to spend FR 3 billion ($500 million) during the tournament will leave most of it in the nation's capital, already its richest city, and not in other areas more in need of an economic boost.

"Paris is winning the battle of attracting business from this World Cup," said Guy Lorient, a spokesman for Nantes's World Cup committee. "Lots of tour operators have preferred to be based in Paris."

The Paris region already accounts for a disproportionate share of economic activity. With 19% of France's population, it produces 29% of its economic output.

Unemployment, at 10.5% in March, was one-third less than the 15.4% of the Marseille region and the 15.7% of the area around Lens, both of which will host games.

Such inequities are in evidence at the World Cup, too. Mondresia, a unit of French hotel group Accor SA that's handling the World Cup's hotel reservation system, said 70% of the 370,000 rooms it has booked are in Paris. Yet only nine of the opening round's 48 matches are in the capital. Thirty-nine are in Nantes, Toulouse, Montpellier, Marseille, Bordeaux, St. Etienne, Lyon and Lens.

While hotels in those towns are full on game nights, many are going empty in the days in between.

With France's high-speed train network, Bordeaux, 600 kilometers to the southwest, is just three-and-a-half hours away. Lyon is 1 hour and forty-five minutes away and Lens just an hour. That allows fans to travel to games for just one day.

How long supporters stick around depends on the nations playing in the matches. For the Italy-Chile match in Bordeaux, the estimated 8,000 Italian supporters came largely just for the day or at most one night, said Olivier Degeufosse, a spokesman at the Bordeaux tourist office. The Chileans started arriving two or three days before, partly because the Chilean team was based nearby, he said.

For the night of the game, the 6,000 hotel rooms in the southwest city were full, said Degeufosse. "Not everyone is sticking around, but I can't say we're disappointed," he said. "The town is very animated with the supporters we have had."

Lorient, the Nantes spokesman, said hotels in his town have been packed on game nights, with people arriving without reservations having to stay up to 50 kilometers away. Even though hotels aren't full in between games, the town estimates the World Cup will bring between FR 90-250 million ($15-$42m.) to the local economy.

It's much the same story in the Lens, whose hotels were full the nights of the two matches it has hosted so far, Denmark-Saudi Arabia and Croatia-Jamaica. But rooms have been easily available on other days, the tourist office said.

Some soccer fans aren't even bothering with hotels. Five Berliners who were getting their faces painted the colors of the German flag at the Place de Trocadero in Paris, said they took a 10-hour bus ride from Berlin and would take it back after Germany's game with the U.S. The Lens tourist office said most Danish supporters chose to use local campgrounds.

By NINA OLBERT

Antitrust Authority director David Tadmor recently sent a notice to the Israel Electric Corporation that he is considering declaring it a monopoly in the production, transmission and distribution of electricity, Industry and Trade Minister Nathan Sharansky revealed yesterday.

Sharansky said he believed the IEC should be under the supervision of the Antitrust Authority in addition to the Public Utilities Authority - Electricity.

"As long as the IEC is a monopoly it should be supervised by the antitrust authority," he added.

The IEC was given 30 days to respond.

However, last night, IEC spokeswoman Yael Ne'eman said Tadmor has not formally approached her company and management will not conduct negotiations with him via the media.

The Antitrust Authority can regulate the IEC once it has been declared a monopoly.

The role of the authority is to protect the competition and to make sure that a monopoly does not abuse its power.

The authority receives complaints against the IEC on an ongoing basis.

Under the Electricity Law, 10 percent of electricity production is to be out of IEC hands by the year 2006.

The first tenders for private production were published recently. The timing of Tadmor's notice coincides with these moves.

Sharansky's statements came in response to a report prepared in advance of the annual conference of the country's top economic echelon to be held this year in Zichron Ya'acov.

The report was commissioned by the Israel Democracy Institute, which is responsible for running the event.

It said the corporation is a natural monopoly in the transmission of electricity but not in its production, which should therefore be privatized.

"Great efforts should be taken to create conditions for real competition in the field of electricity production and also in its distribution," said the report by the "competition and privatization team."

Panel members include Tadmor, his predecessor at the post Yoram Turbowicz, outgoing Koor CEO Benny Gaon, Bezeq chairman Izzy Tapoohi, and former finance minister Dan Meridor.

The authors said that the process should be implemented by breaking up and privatizing production units or increasing production ability via new producers.

Sharansky, whose ministry is responsible for the Antitrust Authority, said in response to the report that he would make great efforts to boost competition in the sector.

The IEC is a central factor in the economy and its capital investment amounts to about one-fourth of all of the capital investment in all areas of industry in the country, Sharansky said.

He noted that the company, with approximately 13,000 workers, is the largest monopoly in the country.

"The production of electricity must be opened to competition," Sharansky declared in a statement.

Bateman receives funding for Turkmenistan project

By DAVID HARRIS

Yokne'am-based Bateman Engineering has, together with its foreign partners secured funding for a $215 million project in Turkmenistan, according to the company's project manager, Shaul Morgenstern.

The project is one of a number which Bateman is currently preparing and is the firm's first entry into the Turkmenistan market. The agent for the Turkmenistan government for the deal is the Herzliya-based Merhav Group. More than $30m. of the financing is being provided by Bank Hapoalim.

The key element is the construction of a gas preparation and compression station.

"This is only the first and it won't be the last," said Morgenstern. "Turkmenistan has the third or fourth largest gas reserves in the world, that's why we're doing this," he said.

The Turkmeni government is acting as guarantor for the project, of which $40m. is coming from Bateman. The company is also responsible for the supply of equipment from the US to the value of $110m. and the work of a Czech contracting firm, ABN-AMRO is also financing the scheme, which is backed by the Israel Foreign Trade Risks Insurance Corp.

The funding is available for two years, the length of construction time, with repayment expected over the following five years.

Morgenstern said his company is not involved in any plans to construct a gas pipeline from Turkmenistan to Israel. "That would cost billions of dollars and while we're a big company, we're not that big," he said. "We're very happy with projects worth $100, $200 or $300 million."

Stocks up on hope interest rate will fall

Tel Aviv

Stocks rose for a second day, with Bezeq and Israel Discount Bank posting some of the biggest gains, amid expectations the central bank will lower interest rates next week for the sixth time this year.

The Maof Index of the 25 largest companies rose 0.56 percent to 335.00.

Israel Discount gained 4.46% to NIS 4.68 on speculation other Israeli banks will bid to buy it in coming months after the government reduces its stake to less than 50%.

Bezeq rose 2.15% to NIS 11.9 as the government plans to sell shares either privately or through a public offering, reducing its stake to 35% from 54%.

"There's talk of a bidding war" for Israel Discount, involving banks such as Bank Leumi Le-Israel and First International Bank of Israel, said Boaz Leviatan, analyst at Sahar Securities. As for Bezeq, "it's the privatization and the fact that Bezeq is fundamentally cheap," he said.

Expectations the Bank of Israel will lower interest rates next week were boosted Tuesday by a report M1 money supply fell 0.9% in May from April. A drop in M1, which is money in public circulation, means people are spending less and is a sign the economy is slowing, giving the central bank leeway to lower rates.

The government also reported this week that consumer prices rose 0.4% in May, a fraction of April's 1.4% rise.

"CPI is low, and that means expectations for more rate cuts," Leviatan said.

Europe

In London, the blue-chip FTSE 100 index shrugged off news of a sharp rise in UK wages during March and closed 103 points, or 1.8 percent, higher at 5823.7 - its second-biggest points gain this year.

But the broader mid-caps index fell after strong wage data fanned fears that British interest rates may have to rise again soon to stem inflation pressures. Average earnings rose by 5.2% in March, up from 4.9% in February and much more strongly than expected.

data, it is a worry. In terms of rates... if this holds up, the Bank of England will raise rates in the third quarter of 1998 at some point," Deutsche Bank economist Ciaran Barr said.

Germany's Xetra Dax index closed up 2.15% at 5,742.83, while France's CAC 40 jumped 1.96% to 4,092.3.

Asia

Japanese stocks traded little changed yesterday as the stronger yen and the possibility of coordinated currency intervention were insufficient to offset concern about banks' bad loans.

"Until Japan does something significant on the bad-debt front and injects confidence in the system, the equity market and the currency market will not turn around," said Coen Kluyver, general manager at ING Baring Securities (Japan) foreign institutional sales department.

The Nikkei 225 index fell 5 points, or 0.03 percent, to 14,715.38. The broader Topix index of all shares on the first section of the Tokyo Stock Exchange added 0.37 point, or 0.03%, to 1156.84.

Nikkei 225 index futures for September delivery traded in Singapore gained 140 points to 14,800; those traded in Osaka rose 140 points to 14,765. An estimated 404 million shares traded on the first section, down from the six-month daily average of 446 million. Gainers outpaced losers about 689 to 392 on the first section.

US Deputy Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers will arrive in Tokyo today to ask for Japanese cooperation in averting another Asian currency crisis, the Nihon Keizai newspaper said.

That helped stabilize the dollar at about 143 yen, after it climbed Tuesday to an eight-year high of 146.78. The dollar recently bought 142.96 yen.

"Players are wondering what Summers has in his bag, so the shorts are going into hiding and the yen is recovering - for now," said Dhia Amir, senior institutional sales trader at Nomura Securities Co. Wall Street

NEW YORK (Reuters) - US stocks soared on yesterday after a central bank intervention ignited a big recovery in the long suffering Japanese yen, defusing the threat of a vicious cycle of currency devaluations in Asia.

Based on early, unofficial results, the Dow Jones industrial average rose 164.17 points, or almost 1.9 percent, to 8,829.46, recapturing a large portion of Monday's 207-point loss.

In the broad market, advancing issues beat declines by a 3-to-1 margin on heavy volume of 724 million shares on the New York Stock Exchange.

Federal Reserve sells dollars for yen

The dollar fell 3.5 percent against the yen after the Federal Reserve sold dollars for the Japanese currency, a move traders interpreted as an attempt to sink the dollar.

"This signals a shift in the Fed's policy and represents a cap for the dollar," keeping it from rising above 145 yen in the weeks ahead, said Gerry Celaya, a senior currency analyst at American Express Bank. "It makes a lot of sense," given the threat the weak yen could slow economic growth throughout Asia, he said.

The dollar fell as low as 138.25 yen, down from an eight-year high of 146.78 set Tuesday. The dollar's losses against the yen also took it lower against the mark, to 1.7868 marks from 1.7977 marks Tuesday.

The yen had declined 10 percent against the dollar this year, threatening to relay Japan's economic slowdown to more of its Asian neighbors by hurting their ability to compete with Japan's exports. China warned yesterday it might devalue its currency if the yen sinks further.

The dollar extended losses made earlier against the yen on expectations US Deputy Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers will press Japan to take additional measures to revive its economy. Japan's Nihon Keizai newspaper reported that Summers will have "emergency discussions" in Japan today.

The US confirmed the Federal Reserve Bank of New York is operating in currency exchange markets for its own account - the first such move by the US since 1995. "The New York Fed is operating in the exchange market on behalf of US monetary authorities," a Treasury spokesman said.

The Fed "finally found a good opportunity to make the most of some intervention with a pause in the dollar appreciation," John Hazleton, chief trader at Manufacturers & Traders Trust Co.

"US authorities believed that the rate of appreciation of dollar was in no one's best interest, especially if you look at equity markets around the world. That's not something they want to spill into the US stock market."

Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin suggested Tuesday that Summers would visit Japan, saying "the weakness of the yen and the weakness of the Japanese economy" means "it might be an appropriate time for Larry Summers to go have direct discussions on the premises, if you will, as opposed to telephonically."

Still, he said, a decision hadn't yet been made.

"There is some hope that Summers can talk Japan into taking more authoritative action," to boost its economy, said Philip Uglow, an economist at Sakura Finance International. "The market doesn't believe Japan has done enough."

Recent comments from Rubin suggested the visit wasn't geared at developing an "intervention" plan, or a plan for a joint move by the US and Japan to sell dollars for yen.

On Tuesday, he again discouraged that approach, saying "the fundamental answer to those fundamental problems is economic policy."

The government announced last week the economy fell into recession for the first time in six years. Japan's gross domestic product shrank 1.3 percent in the first three months of the year from the previous quarter, or 5.3 percent at an annualized rate.

The Fed's move to buy yen "has broken momentum, but does not change the underlying fundamentals," said Marc Chandler, currency strategist at Deutsche Morgan Grenfell. "It doesn't necessarily signal a turnaround in the dollar-yen."

China's Finance Minister Xiang Huacheng said the government's pledge not to devalue the yuan is under threat as its economy continues to slow, in part because exports have been hurt by the weaker yen. China's yuan and the Hong Kong dollar are the only major currencies in East Asia not to have been devalued against the US dollar since the region's financial crisis erupted last year.

Oil jumps after reduction agreement

Energy

Crude oil for July delivery rose 27 cents to $12.25 a barrel after climbing as much as 46 cents, or 3.8 percent, to $12.44 on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Eight countries have now pledged a combined output reduction of 740,000 barrels a day in a second round of cutbacks aimed at lifting prices.

Kuwaiti Oil Minister Sheikh Saud Nasser Al-Sabah said he expects pledges in the current round of oil production cutbacks to total almost 1.2 million barrels a day, Dow Jones Newswires reported from a meeting of six Persian Gulf nations in Riyadh.

The Kuwaiti minister said he expects more announcements from other producers. After floor trading on Tuesday, the American Petroleum Institute reported that US crude oil stockpiles fell a greater-than-expected 1.1 million barrels last week to 344.5 million barrels as imports fell 7%. Much of the decline was in the region that includes Cushing, Oklahoma, where New York futures are delivered.

Heating oil for July delivery rose as much as 0.43 cent, or 1.2%, to 37.40 cents a gallon on the Nymex.

The dollar slumped to its lowest against the yen since June 5 after the Federal Reserve sold dollars for Japanese currency. The dollar sank as low as 138.25 yen, slipping from an eight-year high set against the yen Tuesday. Japan is the world's seventh-largest gold consumer.

the year's 10 scheduled sales to authorized merchants, known as sights, down from a record $2.88b. a year earlier. The company's London-based Central Selling Organization controls the distribution of about 70% of the world's rough diamonds through agreements with producing nations.

Demand for polished diamonds in Japan, the second biggest market after the US with about 20% of world sales, fell 25% last year. Sales in South Korea, Thailand and Indonesia also fell. Analysts expect retail demand to fall further in the second half, although they forecast that De Beers' sales will rise as diamond traders restock their low inventories. (Bloomberg)

US bonds tumble as Fed sells off dollars

US bonds plunged for a second day yesterday after the Federal Reserve and Bank of Japan sold dollars for yen, sending the US currency into a tailspin and reducing the appeal of dollar-denominated investments.

"The downturn in Treasuries is all a dollar story," said George Adell, a trader at Philadelphia-based Starboard Capital Markets. "There's been dollar selling, and that's pressured Treasuries lower."

The benchmark 30-year Treasury bond fell 1/32, or $11.56 per $1,000 bond, pushing its yield up 9 basis points to 5.74 percent. Its yield rose 17 basis points from a record low Monday.

Bonds fell with the dollar after the Fed said it sold dollars and bought the Japanese currency to help boost the yen after it fell to an eight-year low against the dollar in recent days. The dollar's slide began yesterday after news US Deputy Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers may visit Japan today to discuss ways to revive the economy and stop the yen's decline.

In declining, the dollar fell to 138.30 yen from 143.17 late Tuesday in New York.

"As the yen goes up in value and the dollar goes down, it relieves pressure in Asia and there is less of a flight to quality," said Andrew Brenner, head of global fixed-income trading at Fimat USA Inc.

Bonds also fell as stocks in Asia rebounded, led by an 8.5 percent gain in Korea and a 6.2 percent rise in Hong Kong.

"As the crisis relieves itself, it tells you the bond market will go back to where it was," with 30-yields trading between 5.75 percent and 6.10 percent, Brenner said.

Yesterday's Fed action came amid concern the yen's 10 percent fall this year will worsen Japan's recession, hurting its Asian neighbors and growth globally.

Still, some traders such as Adell at Starboard said any move to prop up the yen through central bank purchases would likely not be long-lasting, giving Treasuries room for more gains. Bonds may also get a boost as the recession in Japan and other Asian countries hurts the US economy by sapping demand for American products and services.

"We're having a little breather now, but long-term you want to be positive on Treasuries," said Adell, who predicts 30-year yields could fall to 5.50 percent by month-end.

On Monday, bond yields briefly touched 5.57 percent - the lowest since the Treasury began regular auctions of 30-year securities - capping a rally which sent yields down more than 40 basis points as turmoil in Asia boosted bonds' allure and raised the chances for a slowdown in the US. Investors will get new clues on the economy today with the Federal Reserve's regional survey of economic conditions, known as the Beige Book.

On Tuesday the government said its consumer price index rose a bigger-than-expected 0.3 percent last month, the fastest in 17 months. The index rose 0.2 percent excluding food and energy costs.

Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan and his colleagues on the Federal Open Market Committee next meet to consider interest rates in a two-day meeting beginning June 30. (Bloomberg)

Pioline defaulted for insulting umpire

NOTTINGHAM (Reuters) - Fourth seed Cedric Pioline was thrown out of the Nottingham Open after insulting an umpire yesterday. Pioline, world No. 11 and last year's Wimbledon runner-up, lost his temper in the second set of his second round match over a net cord he claimed was not called.

The Frenchman verbally abused Chilean umpire Pedro Bravo in French and the tournament supervisor was called on to Centre Court. After a heated discussion Pioline was defaulted, handing a quarter-final spot to his opponent Scott Draper, champion at Queen's Club last week.

Past champions may get UEFA wildcards

GENEVA (Reuters) - AC Milan and Borussia Dortmund could win a back-door entry into the UEFA Cup next season even though they have failed to qualify, UEFA said yesterday.

A plan put forward at a UEFA meeting in Paris on Tuesday would give wild card entries to European champions of the past five years who have not been able to earn places in any of the three European club competitions.

A final decision will be taken by UEFA's executive committee in Paris on July 10-11.

NBA players bounced from US roster

NEW YORK (AP) - Faced with an unstable labor situation, USA Basketball on Tuesday announced it would replace the 12 NBA players chosen to represent the United States in the World Championships.

"We are extremely disappointed and regret that this action had to be taken, but training camp for our team starts July 8, and we simply cannot wait until July 2 for a decision before we begin the process of fielding a replacement team," said USA Basketball executive director Warren Brown.

The World Championships begin July 29 in Athens, Greece. The current NBA labor agreement expires July 1 and indications are that a lockout by the owners could be possible.

The 12 NBA players on the US team were: Tim Duncan (San Antonio), Tim Hardaway (Miami), Vin Baker and Gary Payton (Seattle), Terrell Brandon (Milwaukee), Kevin Garnett and Tom Gugliotta (Minnesota), Grant Hill (Detroit), Allan Houston (New York), Christian Laettner (Atlanta), Glen Rice (Charlotte) and Chris Webber (Sacramento).

Rudy Tomjanovich of the Houston Rockets was the coach. Other countries participating are Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Greece, Italy, Japan, Lithuania, Nigeria, Puerto Rico, Russia, Senegal, South Korea, Spain and Yugoslavia.

Graf finds Eastbourne a breeze, Venus blown away

EASTBOURNE (Reuters) - Steffi Graf found the English seaside a breeze yesterday, racing through her first match of Wimbledon warm-up week for the loss of just three games.

The former world No. 1, who has missed much of the last year through a succession of injuries, overcame blustery winds to beat Briton Samantha Smith 6-1 6-2 in her opening game at the Eastbourne grass-court tournament.

But Venus Williams' Wimbledon preparations took a severe knock when the American world number six lost her second-round match.

The usually confident Williams, who like Graf had a first-round bye, looked frustrated and miserable as she battled blustery winds and Belarusian Natasha Zvereva. The fourth seed came off badly against both, crashing out of the tournament 6-2 6-1 in just 38 minutes.

Two other seeds went out of the $450,000 event on Wednesday.

Frenchwoman Nathalie Tauziat, the number seven seed and the 1995 champion here, played an error-ridden game to lose 6-2 4-6 8-6 to Russian Elena Likhovtseva in the first round and Japan's Ai Sugiyama, seeded eighth, went out in the second, losing 6-2 7-5 to Serena Williams, Venus's younger sister.

Boldon equals third fastest 100m time

ATHENS (Reuters) - World 200 meters champion Ato Boldon equalled the third fastest time ever over 100 meters when he clocked 9.86 seconds at an international meeting in Athens yesterday.

Only Olympic champion Donovan Bailey of Canada, who set the world record of 9.84 at the 1996 Atlanta Games and American Leroy Burrell, who set the previous world mark of 9.85 in Lausanne four years ago, have run faster.

Trinidad's Boldon, who also clocked 9.86 at a meeting in Walnut, California, two months ago, finished 0.07 of a second ahead of Namibia's Frankie Fredericks.

Cleveland snaps losing streak

CLEVELAND (AP) - Manny Ramirez homered and drove in six runs, and Bartolo Colon pitched his AL-leading fifth complete game as the Cleveland Indians ended a four-game losing streak with a 9-1 victory over the Kansas City Royals.

Ramirez had a two-run double in the first, a solo homer in the fifth off Kansas City starter Hipolito Pichardo (2-6) and a three-run double in Cleveland's five-run sixth Tuesday night.

Colon (6-4), who has gone at least eight innings in seven of 14 starts, allowed one run and six hits, walking one and striking out two. The 23-year-old lowered his ERA to 2.73.

Devil Rays 4, Blue Jays 3

At St. Petersburg, Toronto's bullpen blew it for the second straight night as Miguel Cairo's RBI double capped Tampa Bay's three-run ninth-inning rally off Randy Myers.

Myers (2-2) was brought in to hold a 3-1 lead for starter Pat Hentgen. With one out, pinch-hitter Aaron Ledesma doubled and scored on Mike Delfino's single. Bobby Smith's base hit sent pinch-runner Randy Winn to third.

Kevin Stocker hit a chopper to short and Winn beat Alex Gonzalez's throw to the plate. Cairo hit Myers' next pitch into right-center for a ground-rule double, scoring Smith.

Jim Mecir (3-0) pitched two scoreless innings for the win.

Orioles 2, Yankees 0

In Baltimore, rookie Sidney Ponson and Arthur Rhodes combined on a two-hitter to end New York's major league record streak of non-losing series at 24.

By winning the first two games of the three-game series, Baltimore assured the Yankees of not splitting or winning a series for the first time since opening the year with two straight losses at Anaheim.

Ponson (1-4), making just his fourth career start and his first at Camden Yards, allowed the two hits in 2-3 innings.

Rhodes finished for his third save. Alomar homered off Hideki Irabu (6-2) and Lenny Webster matched a career-high with three hits for Baltimore.

Red Sox 6, White Sox 1

At Chicago, Pedro Martinez struck out 11 in seven innings to take over the AL lead and Reggie Jefferson hit a two-run homer to lead Boston.

Martinez (8-2) gave up four hits and walked a season-high five. He raised his strikeouts total to 124, passing Seattle's Randy Johnson (122) for the league lead.

Nomar Garciaparra and Lou Merloni each had three hits for the Red Sox, who've won five of six.

Jason Bere (3-6) was charged with five runs and seven hits in 5-1-3 innings.

Athletics 9, Rangers 7

At Arlington, Texas, rookie Ben Grieve homered twice in his home-town debut and Oakland hung on after blowing most of a nine-run lead.

Grieve, who grew up watching the Rangers, hit two-run shots in the first and second innings off Matt Perisho (0-1) in his first game at the Ballpark in Arlington to help the A's take a 6-0 lead.

Grieve's first career multi-homer game led the A's to their fourth victory in their last five games. Texas has lost five of its last six.

Buddy Groom (3-1) pitched two hitless innings of relief for the win, and Billy Taylor pitched a perfect ninth for his 12th save.

Twins 8, Tigers 5

In Detroit, Pat Meares' two-run single put Minnesota ahead to stay in the sixth inning and Ron Comer hit a three-run homer in the seventh as the Twins won for the sixth time in nine games.

Kimera Barbee hit a two-run homer and had a career-high four RBIs for the Tigers, who have lost 12 of 16.

Minnesota trailed 3-2 when one-out singles from Todd Walker and Coomer finished Tigers starter Denny Hargrett (0-1) in the sixth. Sean Runyan walked Matt Lawton before Meares singled home two runs off Tim Worrell to put the Twins ahead.

Reliever Dan Serafini (3-0) got the win and Rick Aguilera got his 14th save.

NATIONAL LEAGUE

Brewers 11, Cubs 2

In Chicago, Jeremy Burnitz, John Jaha and Jose Valentin homered to lead Milwaukee's 16-hit attack as the Brewers snapped Chicago's 10-game home winning streak, 11-2 Tuesday.

Brad Woodall (3-2) held the Cubs scoreless into the seventh inning, allowing four hits with four strikeouts and one walk. He also had three hits, walked once and scored twice.

Milwaukee scored six runs in the sixth, including Valentin's two-run shot. It was his 10th homer of the season, and fourth in his last four games.

Diamondbacks 5, Reds 1

In Cincinnati, Omar Daal set an Arizona record with nine strikeouts and the Diamondbacks got another franchise first - victory No. 1 on artificial turf.

Travis Lee and David Dellucci had three hits apiece for the Diamondbacks, who had four doubles and a triple among their 10 hits.

Daal (3-4) lost his shutout when Chris Stynes singled home a run in the ninth, but he finished for the first complete game of his career.

The Reds lost for the 11th time in 14 games.

Mets 2, Expos 0

In Montreal, Al Leiter pitched a five-hitter for his fifth career shutout and lowered his ERA to an NL-best 1.53.

Leiter (8-3), who won his fifth straight start, struck out seven and walked one as New York won for the 18th time in 26 games. Montreal has lost six of eight.

Butch Huskey's bases-loaded single in the sixth broke up a scoreless duel between Leiter and Dustin Hermanson (4-6).

Braves 7, Marlins 0

In Atlanta, the Braves scored six runs in the first inning and went on to beat Florida in their first meeting since last year's National League championship series.

Ryan Klecko hit the sixth grand slam of his career. Denny Neagle broke a personal three-game losing streak with a four-hitter and Bobby Cox became the winningest manager in Braves history.

Cox has won 1,005 games in two stints as Atlanta manager, breaking the record set by Frank Selee from 1890-1901, when the franchise was in Boston.

Cardinals 9, Astros 4

At Houston, Gary Gaetti hit a three-run homer and Brian Jordan added a two-run shot as the St. Louis Cardinals beat the Astros.

Gaetti homered in a four-run first for the Cardinals, but the Astros rallied to tie it with four runs in the bottom of the inning.

Pete Schourek (3-5) walked home the go-ahead run in the third, Jordan homered off Trevor Miller in the fourth and Delino DeShields hit a solo shot in the eighth.

Mark McGwire, who leads the majors with 31 homers, didn't hit any before the largest weekday crowd of the season (34,822) at the Astrodome. He walked twice, hit into a double play, flew out and struck out.

Phillies 8, Pirates 7

In Philadelphia, Mike Lieberthal's three-run, pinch-hit homer capped a seven-run ninth inning for Philadelphia.

The Phillies trailed 7-1 heading into the ninth but rallied against relievers Ricardo Rincon and Rich Loiselle (1-5).

Rookie Robert Dodd pitched the ninth for the Phillies to get his first major league victory.
